1 Transcript of Record.

Pleas of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan, begun and held at the district court room, in the city of Detroit, in said district, on the first Tuesday of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven.

Be it remembered that on the third day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, Thomas Cosgrove, by E. H. Sellers, his attorney, came into said court and filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, which said petition is in the words and figures following, to wit:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

In the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan, Southern Division.

In the Matter of the Petition of THOMAS COSGROVE for a Writ of Habeas Corpus.

To the Hon. Henry H. Swan, judge of said court:

Your petitioner, Thomas Cosgrove, a resident of Sarnia, Ontario, Dominion of Canada, respectfully shows that he is now imprisoned and restrained of his liberty by Eugene D. Winney, United States marshal for the eastern district of Michigan, in the county jail at Detroit, said county being within said eastern district, southern division, for the supposed criminal offense, to wit, that named in the warrant, a copy of which is hereto attached.

Your petitioner further states and shows that, as he is advised by his counsel, E. H. Sellers, and to whom he has fully and fairly stated the facts and circumstances of the case, and as your petitioner verily believes, the said imprisonment is illegal, and that such illegality consists in this, to wit:

That, at the time your petitioner was arrested under the warrant issuing out of this court and by which he was arrested and imprisoned, he was under arrest caused by a complaint lodged in and warrant issued out of the police court of the city of Detroit, in said
2 county of Wayne, said complaint and warrant bearing date Nov. 7, 1895, and was, under said warrant, immediately taken into custody in said province of Ontario, Canada, and a requisition thereafter was made by Grover Cleveland, President of the United States of America, upon the Canadian government for the extradition of your petitioner; that in pursuance thereof, afterwards, beginning, to wit, on February 29, 1896, and continuing at intervals until April 15th, 1896, your petitioner was examined by the Hon. John A. McKenzie, of the township of Sarnia, county of Lambton, province of Ontario, Dominion of Canada, the said McKenzie being judge in the county court of the said county of Lambton, on the charge of larceny, the offense named in the complaint and warrant issuing out of said police court of the said city of Detroit, and upon the application to commit your petitioner for extradition for the said crime of larceny; that on, to wit, the 15th day of April, A. D. 1896, the said judge, to wit, the Hon. John A. McKenzie, ordered your petitioner to be committed and to be handed over to the authorities of the said city of Detroit; and thereupon a warrant of extradition issued upon the order of said Judge McKenzie for your petitioner's surrender, and on said warrant of extradition your petitioner was brought before said police court of the city of Detroit, and was there examined and held on said charge of larceny in June, 1896, and was bound over for appearance and trial in the recorder's court of the city of Detroit at the July term, 1896, of said recorder's court, by the said judge of said police court, where your petitioner has been held for trial by said recorder's court, but has not been tried, released or discharged by said recorder's court, and is still in the custody of said recorder's court, although your petitioner has often requested to be placed on trial before said recorder's court on said charge of larceny.

Your petitioner further shows that the crime for which he is detained under a warrant issued from this court is alleged to have been committed (if committed at all) prior to your petitioner's extradition from said Dominion of Canada to said State court for the alleged crime of larceny, which your petitioner is advised by his said counsel, and believes, is illegal for the reason that your petitioner having been brought within the jurisdiction of said police and recorder's court at the city of Detroit, by virtue of the proceeding under the extradition treaty between Great Britain and the United States, can only be tried for the offense for which he is charged in the proceeding for his extradition; nor can your 3 petitioner be tried or triable for any offense alleged to have been committed prior to the extradition offense of larceny, for which your petitioner shows he was surrendered to the police court of the city of Detroit, until your petitioner shall have had a reasonable time and opportunity, after his release or trial upon such charge, to return to the province of Ontario, Canada, as provided by said treaty and the laws governing his surrender under said extradition proceedings.

Wherefore, your petitioner prays that a writ of habeas corpus may be issued to inquire into the cause of his said imprisonment and detention, and that he may be relieved therefrom.

And your petitioner will ever pray, etc.

THOMAS COSGROVE.

EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN, } ss:
Southern Division, }

On this 3rd day of March, 1897, personally appeared before me a notary public in and for the county of Wayne, Thomas Cosgrove, known to me to be the person who subscribed the foregoing petition, and made oath that he had read said petition and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true.

GEORGE G. SCOTT,
Notary Public, Wayne County, Michigan.

Grover Cleveland, President of the United States of America, to John F. Troy:

Whereas, it appears by information in due form by me received that Thomas Cosgrove, charged with the crime of larceny, is a fugitive from the justice of the United States, now in Canada;

And whereas, application has been made to the British authorities for the extradition of said fugitive, in compliance with existing treaty stipulations between the United States of America and Great Britain;

And whereas, it is understood that, in compliance with such application, the necessary warrant is ready to be issued by the authorities aforesaid for the delivery of the above-named fugitive into the custody of such person or persons as may be duly authorized to receive the said fugitive and bring him back to the United States for trial:

Now, therefore, you are hereby authorized and empowered, in virtue of the stipulations aforesaid, and in execution thereof,
4 to receive the said Thomas Cosgrove, as aforesaid, and to take and hold him in your custody, and to conduct him from such place of delivery in Canada, by the most direct and convenient means of transportation, to and into the United States, there to surrender the said Thomas Cosgrove, to the proper authorities of the State of Michigan.

For all of which these presents shall be your sufficient warrant.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 9th day of May, A. D., 1896, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and twentieth.

[SEAL.] GROVER CLEVELAND.

Secretary of State.

CANADA:

To the keeper of the common gaol of the town of Sarina, in the province of Ontario, and to John F. Troy:

Whereas, Thomas Cosgrove, accused of the crime of larceny committed within the jurisdiction of the United States of America, was delivered into the custody of you, the keeper of the said common gaol at the town of Sarina aforesaid, by warrant of his honor, John A. MacKenzie, junior judge of the county of Lambton, in the province of Ontario, dated the fifteenth day of April in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six, pursuant to "the extradition act," there to await surrender to the said United States of America.

Now, I do hereby, in pursuance of the said act, order you, the said keeper, to deliver the said Thomas Cosgrove into the custody of the said John F. Troy, and I command you, the said John F. Troy, to receive the said Thomas Cosgrove into your custody and to convey him within the jurisdiction of the said United States of America and there place him in the custody of any person or persons appointed by the said United States of America to receive him.

For which this shall be your warrant.

To the superintendent or any captain, sergeant, roundsman, detective, or patrolman of the Metropolitan police force of the city of Detroit, in said county, Greeting:

Whereas, Eugene D. Winney hath this day made complaint to the undersigned, Albert F. D. 1895, at the city of Detroit, in the county aforesaid, Thomas Cosgrove and William Robinson did feloniously steal, take and carry away of the personal property, goods and chattels of Eugene D. Winney from the possession of him the said Eugene D. Winney then and there being found one boat (named "Aurora") tackle, apparel, and furniture of the value of one thousand dollars.

And whereas, on examination, on oath, of said complainant by me, the said police justice, it appears to me that said offense has been committed, and there is just cause to suspect the said accused parties to have been guilty thereof; therefore,

In the name of the people of the State of Michigan, you and each of you are hereby commanded forthwith to take the said accused parties and them bring before the police court of the city of Detroit at the police-court building, in the said city of Detroit, to be dealt with according to law.

EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN, ss:

I hereby return that I hold the said Thomas Cosgrove, under and by virtue of a capias issued out of and under the seal of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan, the third day of December, A. D. 1895, which said copy of writ of capias I produce herewith. I further return that the date of the caption of said Thomas Cosgrove under said capias was the 10th day of December, 1896; the place, Port Huron, in said district and the cause as specified in said capias was a filing of an indictment by the grand jurors for said district against him on a charge of obstructing the United States marshal in the execution of a 8 writ of attachment. The place of detention of said Thomas Cosgrove is the Wayne County jail in Detroit, in said district. That said Thomas Cosgrove at the time of his arrest on said capias was not in custody upon a warrant issued out of the police court of the city of Detroit, as set forth in the petition, but before that time, had entered into a recognizance to appear and answer an information to be filed against him in the recorder's court of the city of Detroit for the offence charged on said warrant, and at the time said Cosgrove was taken into custody upon said capias, he was at large upon bail before then given. And I further return that after said Cosgrove was brought to the city of Detroit by virtue of the extradition proceedings, referred to in his petition for this writ, and before his arrest upon said capias, he had returned to the Dominion of Canada, and after said return and before his arrest on said capias, he voluntarily came into the United States, to the State of Michigan, and was then found at large after his said voluntary return, and was then arrested upon said capias while so voluntarily in the State of Michigan. I further return that I have the body of said Thomas Cosgrove with me in said court, as within I am commanded.

EUGENE D. WINNEY,
U. S. Marshal,
By A. W. LARGE, Chief Deputy.

Afterwards, at a session of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan, continued and held pursuant to adjournment at the district court room in the city of Detroit in said district, on Wednesday the third day of March in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven.

Present: The Hon. Henry H. Swan, district judge.

In the Matter of the Petition of THOMAS COSGROVE for a Writ of Habeas Corpus.

This matter now came on for hearing, and thereupon is argued by counsel and submitted to the court for judgment. And the same having been duly considered, it is now by the court ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said Thomas Cosgrove be, and he is hereby remanded to the custody of the marshal to await trial.

Thereupon counsel for petitioner gives notice of their intention to appeal herefrom.

9 That afterwards, and on the fifth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, the opinion of the court in said matter was filed, and was in the words and figures following, to wit:

The District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan, Southern Division.

In the Matter of THOMAS COSGROVE, Petitioner for Writ of Habeas Corpus.

E. H. Sellers & Cassius Hollenbeck, for petitioner.
A. P. Lyon, U. S. att'y; C. R. Whitman, ass't U. S. att'y.

SWAN, J.:

The petition in this cause states in the usual formal manner that the petitioner is unlawfully restrained of his liberty by the marshal of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan; and, after adding the averments necessary to proper pleadings for the relief sought, prays that he may be discharged from the custody of the marshal and be set at liberty. Pursuant to the writ, the marshal produced the petitioner and made and filed his return, which set forth that the petitioner is held by the marshal under a writ of capias issued upon an indictment found at the November term, 1895, by the grand jury of this district, and that the petitioner had previously been extradited from the Dominion of Canada to answer an information filed in the recorder's court of the city of Detroit, charging him with the crime of larceny. The return further stated that after the extradition of petitioner under said proceedings in the recorder's court, he "had returned to the Dominion of Canada, and after said return and before his arrest by said capias, he voluntarily came into the United States, namely, to the State of Michigan, and was there found at large after his said voluntary return and was then arrested on said capias while so voluntarily in the State of Michigan." It was objected in behalf of petitioner that the return was not verified. The statute does not require the verification of the return. U. S. Rev. Stats., sec. 757, which regulates the action of the person having the petitioner in custody, provides that "the person to whom the writ is directed shall certify to the court or justice or judge before whom it is returnable, the true cause of the detention of such party." This requirement was observed by the marshal in the return. As sec. 754 enacts that the petition shall be verified by the oath of the person making the application, the omission of the like provision as to the return is persuasive of itself that the latter need not be verified. Section 757 is manifestly complied with by the making of the certificate alone. The objection was therefore overruled and the petitioner was granted an exception to the ruling. Petitioner's counsel also duly excepted to the action of the court in refusing to strike out from the return the averment quoted above, that the defendant had returned to the Dominion of Canada before his arrest on the capias issued upon the indictment, and was arrested thereunder while voluntarily in the State of Michigan. It was conceded upon the argument that Cosgrove had returned to Canada after having given bail in the recorder's court, to answer the charge of larceny, and was at large when arrested under the capias, upon bail so given in the recorder's court as aforesaid. The contention on the part of the petitioner is, that having given bail to answer the information in the State court, he could not be lawfully arrested until he had been tried in that court. The authority invoked for this position is article 3 of the extradition convention between the United States and Great Britain, proclaimed March 25, 1890 (26 U. S. Stats at L., 1508, 1509). That article reads as follows: "No person surrendered by or to either of the high contracting parties shall be triable or be tried for any crime or offense committed prior to his extradition other than the offense for which he was surrendered, until he shall have had an opportunity of returning to the country from which he was surrendered." The offense for which the information was filed in the recorder's court and that for which the indictment was found, it is claimed, are practically the same. This can scarcely be maintained, although it appears that the property, for the taking of which he is charged with larceny, was the vessel which, under the indictment in this court, he was charged with having unlawfully taken from the custody of the United States marshal, while the same was held under a writ of attachment issued from the district court in admiralty.

The same act constituted a crime against the law of a State and the laws of the United States, but an acquittal or conviction in either case would not operate as a bar to the prosecution of the other.

United States v. Fox, 5 How.

It is true that petitioner could not be extradited for the violation of the act of Congress committed in taking the property from the custody of the marshal, and it may also be conceded that 11 during his attendance in the recorder's court for the purposes of his trial there, and while going and returning therefrom to his home in Canada, he could not be subjected to trial for the offense committed against the United States. Article 3 of the extradition treaty gives the person extradited immunity from trial, and—by a liberal construction of its language—from arrest for any offense committed prior to his extradition until he should have had an opportunity to return to the country from which he was surrendered. Its design is to protect a person accused of crime against being subjected to extradition for the real purpose of putting him upon trial for an offense not covered by the extradition treaty, and to prevent the convention between the governments from being used as a mere cloak for an ulterior object for which his surrender could not be claimed. To effect this end, the person who has been delivered for trial in either country, is, under its provisions, entitled to a fair opportunity and a reasonable time to return to his home before he should be triable for any other offense whatever committed before his extradition.

The only question which arises under this treaty therefore, is whether upon the facts stated in the return which was not traversed, the petitioner has had the opportunity secured him by that treaty to return to his own country. If he has had such opportunity, then article 3 has not been violated, either in its letter or spirit, by the arrest and detention of the petitioner. It is conceded that he was delivered to the authorities of the State of Michigan in May, 1896, to stand his trial upon the charge of larceny. He gave bail to appear for trial in the recorder's court when required and immediately returned to Canada. On December 10th, 1896, he voluntarily appeared in the State of Michigan, of his own motion, and not upon the order of the recorder's court, or at the instance of his bail, and while in this district was arrested. The facts fail to show any infringement of the rights of petitioner under the convention of 1890.

No reason exists, therefore, for his discharge, and he must be remanded to the custody of the marshal.

Detroit, April —, 1897.

12 Afterwards, on the seventh day of July, A. D. 1897, a claim of appeal was filed in said matter in the words and figures following:

Claim of Petitioner for Appeal.

And now comes the above-named petitioner, Thomas Cosgrove, by E. H. Sellers, his attorney, and, feeling aggrieved by the final decision of said court made by this court on March 3, 1897, hereby appeals from the said decision of said court in remanding said petitioner to the custody of the U. S. marshal for said district, and refusing to discharge said prisoner from the custody of said marshal, and denying the prayer of petitioner in the above-entitled proceedings to the U. S. Supreme Court, and herewith presents his assignments of error and asks that this appeal be allowed, and that all the records and proceedings in said cause, including so much and such 13 parts of the files and records of U. S. vs. Cosgrove and The People vs. Cosgrove and extradition proceedings therewith as are referred to in and covered by said habeas corpus proceedings, shall be duly certified to the said U. S. Supreme Court.

District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan, Southern Division.

In the Matter of the Appeal of THOMAS COSGROVE, Petitioner for Writ of Habeas Corpus.

Assignments of Error.

Now comes the above-named petitioner, Thomas Cosgrove, by E. H. Sellers, his attorney, and says that in the record of proceedings in said cause and in the rulings, findings and final decision entered therein by said court there is manifest error, as follows:

1. The district court erred in holding that a release of defendant on bail to appear for trial in the recorder's court at Detroit, was such a "release or discharge" as is guaranteed him by the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, and the laws in furtherance of this treaty granting him "a fair opportunity and a reasonable time to return to his home before he should be triable for any other offense whatever committed before his extradition."

2. The court erred in holding that a going back to Canada and voluntarily returning to the United States by defendant while on bail to appear for trial in the recorder's court of Detroit, to which he had been extradited and was held for trial, and for which trial he was presumably within the United States, and where he was urging his trial in said recorder's court, was such a return to his country (Canada) as is accorded him by the treaty and laws under which he was surrendered to the United States on the extradition warrant, and such as would render him subject to the arrest and trial here sought.

15 3. The court erred in holding that the defendant was subject to the arrest on the capias issued out of the United States district court in this cause.

4. The court erred in directing defendant's arrest and holding him under arrest on said capias.

5. That the court erred in not granting the prayer of said habeas corpus petition that defendant be relieved from said detention and imprisonment.

6. The court erred in remanding defendant to the custody of the marshal and holding him for trial pursuant to said arrest on said charge in said United States court.

Wherefore, petitioner and appellant prays that an order be entered by this court, setting aside the order of the district court in remanding the petitioner to the custody of said marshal, and that an order be entered discharging him in accordance with the prayer of said petitioner in said habeas corpus proceeding.

Dated Detroit, July 7th, 1897.

Present: The Hon. Henry H. Swan, district judge.

In the Matter of the Petition of THOMAS COSGROVE for Writ of Habeas Corpus.

This cause having been brought on to be heard before the U. S. court of appeals, sixth circuit, on appeal from this district, and the petition having been dismissed by that court for want of jurisdiction, upon suggestion of said circuit court of appeals that an appeal be allowed petitioner to the U. S. Supreme Court, and that petitioner be released upon his own recognizance pending said appeal, it is ordered that said petitioner, Thomas Cosgrove, be, and he is hereby, released on his own recognizance pending said appeal, and that a copy of this order be served upon Eugene D. Winney, U. S. marshal for the eastern district of Michigan, in whose custody said petitioner now is.

Endorsed on cover: Case No. 16,675. E. Michigan D. C. U. S. Term No., 172. Thomas Cosgrove, appellant, vs. Eugene D. Winney, United States marshal for the eastern district of Michigan. Filed September 24th, 1897.

Supreme Court of the United States.

October Term, 1898

THOMAS COSGROVE, Appellant, vs. EUGENE D. WINNEY, United States Marshal for the Eastern District of Michigan.	File No. 16,675. No. 172.

BRIEF FOR APPELLANT.

I.

This is an appeal on the part of petitioner in habeas corpus, from the final decision of the District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, denying the prayer of petitioner, and remanding him to the custody of the Marshal to await trial in that court.

It appears that on or about October 25th, 1895, the schooner "Aurora," a Canadian boat, while unloading her cargo in Detroit, was libeled for debt by Port Huron parties. Thomas Cosgrove, the appellant, of Sarnia, Ontario, was her captain. The libel was not served on him, and he contends that it was in nowise brought to his attention. A day or two later, having finished unloading the cargo, he procured his clearance papers and departed with his vessel for Sarnia. On Nov. 7th, 1895, Eugene D. Winney, the appellee, who was then the Marshal for this district, and who had served the libel, lodged in the police court for Detroit, which is within said district, a complaint for larceny of the boat. A warrant (Rec., p. 4,) issued thereon, and Cosgrove was taken into custody pursuant thereto, in Sarnia, and extradition proceedings were instituted under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, as supplemented and proclaimed March 25, 1890. The hearing was continued from time to time, beginning Feb. 29, 1896, by Judge McKenzie, who, on April 15, 1896, decided there was ground for Cosgrove's extradition under the treaty, on the charge of larceny of the vessel. (Rec., p. 2.) On May 9, 1896, President Cleveland made a requisition on the Canadian government, (Rec., p. 3,) which that government honored and issued the surrendering warrant (Rec., p. 3) upon which Cosgrove was brought to Michigan under the treaty for trial on the charge of larceny. He was delivered to the police department of Detroit, and was brought into the police court the latter part of May, 1896 (Rec., p. 9) on the surrendering warrant and the warrant of Nov. 7, 1895. He was arraigned in the police court and pleaded not guilty, June 6, 1896, and was there examined on the extradition charge of larceny, June 12, 1896, and was by the court bound over for trial in the Recorder's Court for Detroit, (the court of competent jurisdiction to determine the case,) at the July term, 1896, on the larceny charge. (Rec., p. 2.) The procedure in that court is by information. An information charging Cosgrove with the larceny offense upon which he had been surrendered under the extradition proceedings was duly filed, the case was placed upon the docket of that court for the July term, 1896, and was kept upon that docket, and the docket of every succeeding term of that court, and the trial thereof urged by Cosgrove to the time of his arrest on the capias issued from the District Court, and to the time of suing out the habeas corpus. (Rec., p. 2.) The Recorder's Court kept the case pending and on the docket, but refused to place him on trial. He furnished bail in that court.

In December, 1895, the grand jury in the District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan—Southern Division—indicted appellant Cosgrove on the charge of resisting the Marshal in the service of a writ of attachment (Rec., pp. 5, 6, 8, 9,) and the charge of unlawfully removing a vessel from the custody of the Marshal, (Rec., pp. 8, 9,) offenses growing out of the same act as the larceny charge. A capias issued on the indictment in the same month on a charge of obstructing the U. S. Marshal in the execution of a writ of attachment, (Rec., p. 5,) a non-extraditable offense. The capias was not served until Dec. 14, 1896, and while appellant was on bail within the district awaiting his trial on the extradition charge of larceny in the Recorder's Court. He could not furnish bail in the District Court, and was held by the Marshal in the county jail. The District Court arraigned him. He interposed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court to hold him for trial, or try him, and asserted that his arrest on the capias was illegal, in that he was not subject to arrest or triable on the District Court charge until a reasonable time after his trial on or discharge from the charge of larceny, for which he had been surrendered to the State Court under the extradition proceedings. The witnesses are substantially the same in both cases. But the penalty in the U. S. Court case is double that of the State Court, to which he was delivered on the charge of larceny.

Continually from Cosgrove's arrest on the capias, the marshall held him thereon imprisoned in the county jail and prevented his trial in the recorder's court. In the latter part of Feb., 1897, the district court sought to try him upon the charges set forth in the indictment on which the capias issued and he had been arrested and was held for trial in that court. A few days later, viz: on March 3, 1896, he petitioned the district court for a writ of habeas corpus (Rec., p. 1) which was issued. (Rec., p. 5.) The matter was argued and submitted. The court denied the prayer for release from imprisonment and remanded Cosgrove to the custody of the marshal to await trial in that court. (Rec. p. 7.) From this order an appeal was at once taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit. The result of that appeal is shown in the following letter:

"United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, Judge's Chambers, Cincinnati,

July 6th, 1897.

The Hon. H. H. Swan,
Judge U. S. Court,
Detroit, Mich.

My Dear Judge:—

We heard to-day the appeal in the case of Thos. Cosgrove, appellant, against the United States. Upon a suggestion of the District Attorney, after the case had been fully argued on its merits, we were obliged to find that the case involved only the construction of a treaty, and therefore under section 5 of the Court of Appeals Act, the Circuit Court of Appeals had no jurisdiction of the appeal and we were obliged to dismiss the appeal. We were convinced, however, that is, the members of the court, Judge Lurton, Judge Clark and myself, that there was grave reason to doubt the correctness of your conclusion in the case, and it was suggested that another writ of habeas corpus might be taken out before one of the members of the court sitting in the Circuit Court. It has occurred to me, however, that the shortest way is to suggest to you from your colleagues of the circuit bench that you release Cosgrove on his own recognizance under the writ of habeas corpus, and that you allow an appeal directly to the Supreme Court. As we have dismissed the appeal in this court the case is pending in the District Court, and you would have power, I doubt not, to make any order of release and fix any bond. I have delivered this letter into the hands of Mr. Sellers, counsel for Cosgrove, and he will present it to you. I write this letter with the concurrence of the other members of the court.

Very sincerely yours,
WILLIAM H. TAFT."

The appeal to this court was allowed July 7, 1897. (Rec., p. 10.) Cosgrove's own recognizance was then taken under the writ of habeas corpus, as suggested in the letter from the Circuit Court of Appeals. (Rec., p. 11.) The Recorder's Court case was still pending and undetermined.

Appellant contends that the tenth article of the treaty under which he was extradited on the charge of larceny, the Acts of Congress passed to carry that and similar treaties into effect, the decisions of the court, notably the Federal Supreme Court in the case of Rauscher, the British "Extradition Acts," the requisition and the surrendering warrant, gave him, on his delivery to the state authorities, immunity from arrest on the charge of any other offense, for a reasonable time after his acquittal of the charge; or, if not tried thereon, for a reasonable time after being set at liberty, to return unmolested to Canada. Appellee contends that a release on bail affords the opportunity contemplated by the treaty and renders the accused liable to arrest and trial in the District Court.

This position the appellant denies and says that bail does not affect the operation of the extradition treaty.

Cosgrove asks a reversal of the decision of the District Court and for his discharge from the custody of the marshal and District Court. (Rec., pp. 10 and 11.)

II.

Appellant relies on assignments 1 to 6, (Rec., pp. 10 and 11), both inclusive.

The real error complained of in the appeal consists in the District Court's holding that Cosgrove, extradited from Canada to the Recorder's Court of Detroit, and remaining on bail awaiting his trial in that court on the extradition charge of larceny, was liable to arrest on the District Court capias and trial on the charges or either of them therein and in the indictment named; and further, that the District Court erred in not discharging Cosgrove from the custody of the marshal and in remanding him to the custody of the marshal and District Court.

III.

This appeal draws in question the construction of the treaty made under the authority of the United States in 1889, (C. C. A., letter supra,) and must be direct from the District Court to the Supreme Court.

C. C. A., Letter Supra.
26 U. S. Stat., at L., Pages 827, 828, Sec. 5.

The appellant was in custody of the marshal in violation of a treaty of the United States, and a writ of habeas corpus was the proper remedy to secure his release (Rev. Stat., U. S., Sec. 753.) The District Court had power to issue the writ for the purpose of an inquiry into the cause of the restraint of appellant's liberty (U. S., Rev. Stat., Secs. 751, 752,) and the writ was properly directed to the marshal (the appellee) in whose custody the appellant was detained (Rec., p. 6, U. S. Rev. Stat., Sec. 755).

Habeas Corpus is the appropriate remedy to obtain discharge from imprisonment under an order or a process of a court, which it was without jurisdiction to make or issue.

And where, as in the present case, personal liberty of the appellant is concerned, the judgment of the District Court is not conclusive. The question of the court's authority to hold him for trial may be reviewed by this court on habeas corpus.

Ex Parte Siebold, 100 U. S., 371.

While a United States court has power to release on habeas corpus a party restrained of his liberty in violation of the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States, under state process on an indictment for an offense against the laws of a state (Ex parte Royall, 117 U. S., 241; In re Reinitz, 39 Fed. Rep., 205) a state court has no jurisdiction to issue a writ of habeas corpus, or to continue the proceedings under the writ when issued, for the discharge of a person held under the authority, or claim and color of authority, of the United States, by an officer of that government. (Tarble's Case, 13 Wall., 397.) It follows that by the act of the District Court, taking and holding Cosgrove in the custody of the marshal on the capias, it forestalled his trial in the Recorder's Court to which he had been extradited.

Tarble's Case, Supra.
U. S. vs. Booth, 21 How., 506.
Black's Const. Law, p. 143.
Baker's Annotated Const. of U. S., p. 60.

Were it larceny of the vessel, the offense upon which Cosgrove was extradited to the State Court, that the District Court sought to try him upon and arrested him on the capias for the purpose of that trial, the District Court would have no jurisdiction; for the record shows clearly that the warrant issued from the State Court, and he was taken into custody pursuant thereto before the complaint or proceeding was entered in the District Court, and that the State Court case was followed and complete jurisdiction for trial therein effected by delivering him to the State Court under the extradition proceedings, long before he was seized on the capias from the District Court. The State Court had acquired jurisdiction over the person of the accused and the subject matter, and was entitled to retain that jurisdiction unmolested by the District Court. It was said by Mr. Justice Swayne in Taylor vs. Taintor, 16 Wall., 370, that "where a State Court and a court of the United States may each take jurisdiction, the tribunal which first gets it holds it to the exclusion of the other, until its duty is fully performed and the jurisdiction invoked is exhausted; and this rule applies alike to both civil and criminal cases." And it was likewise said by Mr. Justice Field in Rio Grande Railroad Co. vs. Gomila, 132 U. S., 485, "where a State and a Federal court have concurrent jurisdiction over the same subject matter, that court which first obtains jurisdiction will retain it to the end of the controversy, either to the exclusion of the other, or to its exclusion, so far as to render the latter's decision subordinate to the other; a doctrine which, with some exceptions, is recognized both in Federal and State Courts. Wallace vs. McConnell, 13 Pet., 136, 143; Taylor vs. Taintor, 16 Wall., 366, 370." Also, U. S. vs. Van Fossen, 1 Dillon, 411.

But it is not upon the charge of larceny that the District Court seeks to try Cosgrove. It is upon much more serious charges—resisting the marshal in the service of the attachment (Rec., pp. 5 and 6,) and running away with the vessel (Rec., pp. 8 and 9.)

The marshal (appellee) is the party who set the machinery of both courts in motion. The State Court acquired the jurisdiction and must retain it, under the laws and treaty provisions governing Cosgrove's surrender to that court. The marshal cannot turn aside from the State Court to the District Court for the trial of the accused. In the language of Judge Campbell, we say, "Can a person who has been demanded for prosecution as a criminal, and who could not have been demanded on any other ground, be arrested after arriving here on a different complaint, and have his original accusation dropped, by the same prosecuting authority? If the requisition had been made for an expressly fraudulent purpose, with no expectation of prosecution for the crime which was its pretext, we do not think any department of the government could sanction such a use without the plainest perversion of justice. No ingenious reasoning could remove from such a transaction the disgrace which no decent commonwealth could afford to incur." Frank Cannon's Case, 47 Mich., 486.

"The privilege of the accused remains, though the indictment and record be unassailable." (ex parte, McKnight, 48 Ohio St., 604). The question in the appeal under consideration is not whether Cosgrove committed a crime, but whether he is lawfully held in custody by the marshal and the district court.

Brown on Jurisdiction, Sec. 98.

Assignments three and four will be considered and treated together.

In the light of the present treaty between the United States and Great Britain, the legislative acts, the decisions of the courts, the requisition and the surrendering warrant, it would seem idle to contend that had Cosgrove remained in jail continually from the time he reached the state court on the extradition warrant, to the time he was arrested on the capias issued from the district court, he would be subject to such arrest and triable on the district court charges while the extradition charge was still pending against him in the state court. No claim is made that he was not extradited under the treaty, with all the rights and immunities accorded by that treaty to an extradited person charged with an offense therein named. Neither is it claimed that the offense charged against him in the district court capias is an extraditable offense. The controversy really is whether Cosgrove being on bail pending the trial of his case in the recorder's court on the charge upon which he had been surrendered for trial in that court, lost his treaty protection by so being on bail and thereby rendered himself subject to arrest on the capias and triable in the District Court for offenses other than the offense upon which he was surrendered, and alleged to have been committed prior to his extradition. If being bailed cost him his treaty immunity, it would seem to follow that in extradition cases, to preserve inviolate the treaty protection from subsequent arrest pending his trial on the extradition charge, the accused must forego bail and remain constantly within the prison walls. In other words, under appellee's counsel's construction of the treaty and laws governing Cosgrove's surrender, the right to bail afforded by the federal and state constitutions is, in otherwise bailable cases, withheld from such extradited person, if he would continue under the treaty protection. For if on bail, after a few days elapse, the extradited person would be to the same extent, subject to arrest on another charge, if he remain within the country to which he was extradited, as if he had returned from the country of his asylum. The treaty says the person shall have an opportunity of returning to the country of his asylum. If he does not avail himself of such opportunity, he is at once thereafter subject to arrest in the same degree as if he had gone back to the country of his asylum and then reappeared in the country to which he was extradited.

The treaty of 1842 enumerated seven distinct offenses as extraditable. It did not include larceny. Larceny was added in the supplemental treaty proclaimed March 25, 1890. This treaty does not contain the offense named in the capias issued on the District Court indictment. Section three of the tenth article of this treaty, called the Treaty of 1889, is as follows:

"No person surrendered by or to either of the high contracting parties shall be triable or be tried for any crime or offense. committed prior to his extradition, other than the offense for which he was surrendered, until he shall have had an opportunity of returning to the country from which he was surrendered."

26 U. S. Stat., at L., pp. 1508, 1509.

This action expressly limits the surrender to one offense and the trial of the accused on that offense and no other, until he shall have had an opportunity of returning to the country of his asylum on regaining his liberty. The treaty of 1842, did not in express terms contain this limitation.

But this court, several of the Federal Circuit and District Courts, and some of the State Courts, declared such to be the meaning of the tenth article of that treaty.

These and other cases have established the rule that when the rights and immunities of the person surrendered to the United States under the treaty are invaded by seeking to hold and try him on a charge other than the one upon which he was surrendered under the treaty, it is within the domain of the courts to interfere in his behalf on his application and restore him to his treaty protection. It is true that the cases of U. S. vs. Caldwell, 8 Blatchford, 131; U. S. vs. Lawrence, 13 Blatchford, 295; and Adriance vs. Lagrave, 59 N. Y., 110, hold that such interference is not a matter for the judicial but is for the executive department of government.

The Caldwell and the Lawrence cases were decided by the same judge, and the Lagrave case was by a divided court. The case of Rauscher and other cases clearly present the rule that, under the Federal Constitution, a treaty is a law of the land, and when its meaning is in clear terms expressed, the courts refer to it and carry out its provisions as they would an act of congress. Chief Justice Marshall said: "Our constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is consequently to be regarded in the courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the legislature whenever it operates of itself, without the aid of any legislative provision."

Foster vs. Neilson, 2 Peters, 253.

The treaty is the supreme law of the land, and of it the court was required to take judicial notice.

U. S. Const., Art. 6, Sec. 2.
U. S. vs. Rauscher, 119 U. S., 419.
People vs. Stout, 30 N. Y. Supp., 900.

In a well considered case under the treaty of 1842, in 1878, Chief Justice Lindsay, speaking for the court, said: "It would scarcely be regarded an abuse of the rules of construction from these manifest restrictions, unaided by extraneous considerations, to deduce the conclusion that it was not contemplated by the contracting parties that an extradited prisoner should, under any circumstances, be compelled to defend himself against a charge other than the one upon which he is surrendered, much less against one for which his extradition could not be demanded."

Commonwealth vs. Hawes, 13 Bush, 705.

The act of the British parliament, passed in 1843 for the purpose of carrying the treaty into effect, provided that such persons that should thereafter be extradited to the United States should be delivered "to such person or persons as shall be authorized in the name of the United States to receive the person so committed, and to convey him to the United States, to be tried for the crime of which such person shall be accused."

Com. vs. Hawes, Supra, 707.

Then the court, referring to section 5272 of the U. S. Rev. Stat., passed in 1848, say: "This, like the act of Parliament, declares the purpose of the surrender to be, that the alleged offender may 'be tried for the crime of which such person shall be accused.' "

Id., 708.

"While legislative interpretation of statutes is not conclusive upon the courts, yet in the case of a treaty which is in its nature a contract between nations, enactments like these by the high contracting parties are of persuasive power in the construction of the treaty."

State vs. Vanderpool, 39 Ohio St., 279.

"The maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius may, with propriety, be applied to each of these acts; and read in the light that maxim they are persuasive, at least, of the construction which, up to 1848, the two contracting parties had placed on the 10th article of the treaty.

"The doctrine has long prevailed with us that a foreign government has no right to demand the surrender of a violator of its laws, unless we are under obligations to make the surrender in obedience to the stipulations of an existing treaty."

Lawrence's Wheaton on International Law, 233, and authorities cited.

"The right of one government to demand and receive from another the custody of an offender who has sought asylum upon its soil depends upon the existence of treaty stipulations between them, and in all cases is derived from and is measured and restricted by the provisions, express and implied, of the treaty."

Com. vs. Hawes, Supra, 708, 709.

Also State vs. Vanderpool, Supra.

On the authority of numerous European writers, Mr. William Beach Lawrence said: "All the right which a power asking an extradition can possibly derive from the surrender must be what is expressed in the treaty, and that all rules of interpretation require the treaty to be strictly construed; and, consequently, where the treaty prescribes the offenses for which extradition can be made and the particular testimony to be required, the sufficiency of which must be certified to the executive authority of the extraditing country, the state receiving the fugitive has no jurisdiction whatever over him, except for the specified crime to which the testimony applies."

14 Albany Law Journal, 96.

"The Lord Chancellor of England gave it as his opinion, in a speech in the Winslow case, in the House of Lords, that the authorities sustained the principle that, 'apart altogether from the wording of treaties, there is a silent and implied condition in extradition that the crime for which the surrender of a man is asked must be specified, and that it is for that crime alone that he must be tried.' This statement is supported by numerous European authorities. The Lord Chancellor quotes from the circular of the French Minister of Justice, issued April 15, 1841, as follows: 'The extradition declares the offense which leads to it, and this offense alone ought to be inquired into. So that if during the prosecution for the crime which has led to the extradition, there should arise the evidence of a new crime, a new demand of extradition ought to be made.' See, the Foreign Relations of the United States for 1876, pp. 286-296."

Dr. Wharton says: "The proper object of extradition is to secure the presence of a fugitive in the demanding state for the purpose of trying him for a specified crime. The process is not to be used for the purpose of subjecting him collaterally to criminal prosecutions other than that specified in the demand. Provisions guaranteeing to the fugitive the right to leave the demanding country after his trial for the offense for which he is surrendered, in case of acquittal, or in case of conviction, after his endurance of punishment, are incorporated in many treaties. When not, they should be made subject of executive pledge. It is an abuse of this high process, and an infringement of those rights of asylum which the law of nations rightly sanctions, to permit the charge of an offense for which extradition lies to be used to cover an offense for which extradition does not lie, or which it is not considered politic to invoke."

Wharton, Confl. R., (2nd Ed.,) Sec. 846, p. 744.

"The rule as stated by the German author, Heffter, is that, 'The individual whose extradition has been granted cannot be prosecuted or tried for any crime except that for which the extradition has been obtained. To act in any other way, and to cause him to be tried for other crimes or misdemeanors, would be to violate the mutual principle of asylum and the silent clause contained by implication in every extradition.'

"President Tyler expressed the opinion that the treaty of 1842 could not be used to secure the trial and punishment of persons charged with treason, libels, desertion from military service and other offenses * * *

"This construction of the tenth article of the treaty is * * * essential to render it absolutely certain that the treaty cannot be converted into an instrument by which to obtain the custody and secure the punishment of political offenders."

Com. vs. Hawes, 13 Bush, 712, 713.

The British government, unlike our own in this respect, regards a treaty as an international compact, not a legislative act, and a violation of a treaty provision in favor of the accused, a matter for consideration by the executive department of that government. The British Parliament has likewise legislated upon the subject of surrender of persons accused of crime under treaty. "The Extradition Act, 1870," provides as follows: "A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered to a foreign state, unless provision is made by the law of that state, or by arrangement, that the fugitive criminal shall not, until he has been restored or had opportunity of returning to Her Majesty's dominions, be detained or tried in that foreign state for any offense committed prior to his surrender other than the extradition crime proved by the facts on which the surrender is grounded."

33 and 34 Vict., Ch. 52, Sec. 8, Subd. 2.

In an extradition case arising under the treaty with Mexico, the court said: "Why stipulate in solemn compact that the government upon whom the demand is made shall have the right to examine into the charge, and, if a prima facie case is not shown, to refuse to surrender, if after being extradited the party extradited can be forced to answer to a charge neither named in the treaty nor examined by the authorities of the government making the surrender? In exact and unequivocal language the treaty sets out the precise purpose for which the fugitive is to be surrendered, and negatives by implication as strong and conclusive as a direct and positive negation that the person surrendered may be tried for offense different from that for which he was extradited under the stipulations of the contract made between the high contracting parties."

Blandford vs. State, 10 Tex. App., 638.

"All civilized nations agree on one point, and that is, that they will not deliver a fugitive to be tried for political offenses, and through great caution, with a view to prevent this, the sixth article of the above treaty provides, among other things, that 'the provisions of the present treaty shall not be applied in any manner to any crime or offense of a purely political character.' What supreme nonsense is this, if the fugitive can be extradited for one crime and then placed on trial for another—make a prima facie case of murder, extradite, and then try him for rebellion! Our conclusion is, that the party extradited must be tried, if tried at all, alone upon the charge upon which he was extradited."

Id., 639.

In another case, under the treaty of 1842, the court says: "An extradited person cannot lawfully be detained or tried on any charge other than the one on which he was surrendered by the extraditing government. * * * * For the latter government to detain such person for trial on any other charge would be not only an infraction of the contract between the parties to the treaty, but also a violation of the supreme law of this land in a matter directly involving his personal rights. Field, Extra., 107. A right of person or property, secured or recognized by treaty, may be set up as a defense to a prosecution in disregard of either, with the same force and effect as if such right was secured by an act of congress." Ex parte Hibbs, 26 Fed. Rep.. 431.

"Where a person whose extradition has been granted for trial for a particular crime named in the extradition warrant, the demanding government obtains no lawful right to try him for any other offenses, without bad faith to the government that consented to his extradition, and for which it would have just grounds to demand reparation. Such an act would be a violation of both the letter and spirit of the treaty." Ker vs. People, 110 Ill., 641, 642.

Again, reference is made to the Ohio case, under the treaty of 1842, wherein the court said, the treaty "limits the duty of surrender to those cases specified in the treaty, in which the evidence of guilt is sufficient, according to the laws of the nation where the fugitive or person charged is found, to justify his committal for trial, if the act charged had been committed there. The right of the nation where the fugitive is found to first hear and determine the case, and to decide upon the evidence whether according to its own laws the crime charged has been committed, i. e. whether a case for committal has been made out, secures to the government upon which the demand has been made the right to determine for itself whether the demand shall be complied with. This necessarily excludes the idea that the demanding government can decide for itself to try the prisoner, after obtaining custody, for other crimes; otherwise the purpose of the treaty is defeated. If the demanding government can so decide, the whole intention of the treaty could be defeated, and the right of asylum, which has been the boast of both governments, would depend entirely upon the action of the demanding government.

"To extradite under the treaty for an offense named therein, and then to retain the prisoner for a non-extraditable offense, or for a different one, though extraditable, upon which no hearing had been had as provided in the treaty, would be not only a breach of good faith by the demanding government, but a violation of the right of asylum in favor of the accused, guaranteed to him by the treaty. The sole object of the treaty was to enable each government to protect its citizens and inhabitants in the right of asylum, except they come within the provisions named. The legislation of both governments clearly supports this construction."

State vs. Vanderpool, 39 Ohio St., 278, 279.

The case of Watts was decided by Judge Hoffman of the District Court of California. (14 Fed. Rep., 130.) Watts was indicted for crimes arising under the U. S. and fled to England. He was extradited and brought back. It was claimed in his behalf that he could only be tried for the crime for which he had been extradited. And the court there held that an extradited fugitive could not, under the treaty of 1842, between the United States and Great Britain, be held to answer for an offense for which his surrender could not have been asked and would not have been granted. This question afterwards came up before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Rauscher. Rauscher had been indicted upon a charge of murder committed upon the high seas within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States. He fled to England, and was extradited and brought from there to New York. Subsequently and while he was awaiting trial on this charge, he was indicted and an attempt made to subject him to trial on the charge of beating and wounding a sailor on board a ship. The question in that case arose whether or not he could be tried upon the charge of beating and wounding a sailor on board a ship. it being admitted that the same witnesses and substantially the same testimony, delivered in the case of beating and wounding, would have been delivered in the case of murder. The Federal Supreme Court, in line with the case of Watts and other cases, in the opinion written by Mr. Justice Miller, held that the person extradited could only be tried for the crime for which he was extradited unless, after having been tried for such crime, a sufficient period had elapsed after having been released for him to return to the country of his asylum.

In decidlng the case the court said: "Nor can it be said that, in the exercise of such a delicate power under a treaty so well guarded in every particular, its provisions are obligatory alone on the state which makes the surrender of the fugitive, and that that fugitive passess into the hands of the country which charges him with the offense, free from all positive requirements and just implications of the treaty under which the transfer of his person takes place. A moment before, he is under the protection of a government which has afforded him an asylum from which he can only be taken under a very limited form of procedure, and a moment after he is found in the possession of another sovereignty by virtue of that proceeding, but divested of all the rights which he had the moment before, and of all the rights which the law governing that proceeding was intended to secure."

U. S. vs. Rauscher, 119 U. S., 421.

"As this right of transfer, the right to demand it, the obligation to grant it, the proceedings under which it takes place, all show that it is for a limited and defined purpose that the transfer is made, It is impossible to conceive of the exercise of jurisdiction in such a case for any other purpose than that mentioned in the treaty, and ascertained by the proceedings under which the party is extradited, without an implication of fraud upon the rights of the party extradited, and of bad faith to the country which permitted his extradition."

Id., 422.

And in the Rauscher case it is said that, Sec. 5272, Rev. Stat. U. S., provides for the surrender by the United States to a foreign goveanment of a person there charged with crime "to be tried for the crime of which such person shall be so accused."

Section 5275 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, quoted by the court, declares:—"Whenever any person is delivered by any foreign government to an agent of the United States, for the purpose of being brought within the United States and tried for any crime of which he is duly accused, the President shall have power to take all necessary measures for the transportation and safe-keeping of such accused person, and for his security against lawless violence, until the final conclusion of his trial for the crimes or offenses specified in the warrant of extradition, and until his final discharge from custody or imprisonment for or on account of such crimes or offenses, and for a reasonable time thereafter, and may employ such portion of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as may be necessary for the safe-keeping and protection of the accused."

And the court then say:

"The obvious meaning of these two statutes, which have reference to all treaties of extradition made by the United States, is that the party shall not be delivered up by this government to be tried for any other offense than that charged in the extradition proceedings; and that, when brought into this country upon similar proceedings, he shall not be arrested or tried for any other offense than that with which he was charged in those proceedings, until he shall have had a reasonable time to return unmolested to the country from which he was brought. This is undoubtedly a congressional construction of the purpose and meaning of extradition treaties such as the one we have under consideration, and, whether it is or not, it is conclusive upon the judiciary of the right conferred upon persons brought from a foreign country into this under such proceedings. That right, as we understand it, is that he shall be tried only for the offense with which he is charged in the extradition proceedings, and for which he was delivered up; and that, if not tried for that, or after trial and acquittal, he shall have a reasonable time to leave the country before he is arrested upon the charge of any other crime committed previous to his extradition."

U. S. vs. Rauscher, 119 U. S., 423, 424.

In that opinion the court reviewed the cases of U. S. vs. Caldwell, 8 Blatchford, 131; Com. vs. Hawes, 13 Bush, 697; Blandford vs. State. 10 Tex. App., 627; State vs. Vanderpool, 39 Ohio St., 273, and other cases, and then said:

"Upon a review of these decisions of the Federal and State Courts, to which may be added the opinions of the distinguished writers, which we have cited in the earlier part of this opinion, we feel authorized to state that the weight of authority and of sound principle are in favor of the proposition, that a person who has been brought within the jurisdiction of the court by virtue of proceedings under an extradition treaty, can only be tried for one of the offenses described in that treaty, and for the offense with which he is charged in the proceedings for his extradition, until a reasonable time and opportunity have been given him, after his release or trial upon such a charge, to return to the country from whose asylum he had been forcibly taken under those proceedings."

U. S. vs. Rauscher, 119 U. S., 429, 430.
Also, People vs. Stout, 30 N. Y., Supp., 898, Nov. '94.

This court, in the opinion, also written by Mr Justice Miller, in Ker vs. Illinois, 119 U. S., 443, said: "In the case of U. S. vs. Rauscher, just decided, ante, 407, and considered with this, the effect of extradition proceedings under a treaty was very fully considered, and it was there held, that, when a party was duly surrendered, by proper proceedings, under the treaty of 1842 with Great Britain, he came to this country clothed with the protection which the nature of such proceedings and the true construction of the treaty gave him. One of the rights with which he was thus clothed, both in regard to himself and in good faith to the country which had sent him here, was, that he should be tried for no other offense than the one for which he was delivered under the extradition proceedings."

"A treaty may be the foundation of a private right, and then it becomes the subject of judicial action, as does any other private right. This subject has been well considered in the case of the United States vs. Rauscher, who was returned from Great Britian to this country, in pursuance of a demand of the President, on the charge of murder. He was tried, and a verdict of guilty rendered by the jury on the charge of inflicting cruel and unusual punishment upon one of the seamen of the vessel on which he was an officer. He denied the authority of the court to try him for this, or for any other offense, except that for which he had been surrendered in the extradition proceedings. The Supreme Court, in response to questions certified to it by the Judges of the Circuit Court, held that his contention was sound, and that the treaty would, in the event that he was either acquitted or not tried for the offense for which he had been extradited, give him a right to be set at liberty and allow him a reasonable time to return to Great Britain. The court, referring to the Head Money Cases, quoted from its language in that case in reference to the character of a treaty as a law of the land."

Miller on the U. S. Constitution, pp. 322, 323.

The general term of the Supreme Court of N. Y., in a case arising under the present treaty, said: "By virtue of the supreme law of the land, the custody of the relator was so qualified as not to exist other than for the purpose of his trial upon that specific charge. For any other purpose his person was beyond the legitimate control of the court, excluded from it by force of the international treaty."

"It is settled by the judgment of the Supreme Court in the case of U. S. vs. Rauscher, 119 U. S., 407, 7 Sup. Ct., 234, as well as by the provisions of Section 5275, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, that, under the treaty with Mexico, the petitioner is exempt from trial for any other offense than that specified in the warrant of extradition until he has had a reasonable time to depart out of the United States."

And the Court of Appeals of N. Y., per O'Brien, J., said :

"Whether fugitives from justice extradited from foreign countries for offenses against the United States or any of the states could be brought within the proper jurisdiction for any offense except that charged in the papers upon which the accused was surrendered by the foreign government was, until quite recently, a question that produced much conflict of judicial authority. The Supreme Court of the United States has settled the question, so far as concerns the obligation due to foreign nations, or to persons surrendered by them, upon the demand of the Federal Government pursuant to treaty obligations. (U. S. vs. Rauscher, 119 U. S., 407.)

"In that case it appeared that Rauscher was surrendered by the Government of Great Britain to the United States upon its demand, for murder committed upon the high seas, an offense of which its courts had jurisdiction, and that he was subsequently tried and convicted of another and minor offense, namely, the cruel and inhuman punishment of the same seaman, and thus the act for which he was extradited and tried was the same.

"It is urged by the learned counsel for the relator that this is a controlling authority in the case at bar. But we think that there is a material distinction between the facts and circumstances of that case and those disclosed by the record before us. It must be noted in the first place that much stress was laid in that decision, and very properly, upon the fact that by the act of Congress relating to extradition from foreign nations upon the application of the Federal Government, it is expressly provided that the person surrendered shall not, when brought to this country, be tried for any other or different offense. This is the construction given to the act in the case last cited. (119 U. S., p. 433, U. S. R. S., Sec. 5275.)

"The Act of Congress passed in pursuance of the Federal Constitution is the supreme law of the land, and this law protected Rauscher from trial for any other offense than the one upon which he was surrendered to this government by the British authorities. Moreover, the laws of Great Britain, from which jurisdiction the fugitive had been extradited, forbid the surrender by that government of persons charged with crime in other jurisdictions, to countries under whose laws the person demanded was liable to be tried for some other or different offense than that charged in the application for extradition. (33 and 34 Vict., Ch. 52; Adriance v. Lagrave, 59 N. Y., 115.) And, therefore, when the United States took the fugitive from the protection of those laws, its faith and honor was pledged, at least impliedly, to the effect that it would not permit its courts to try him for any other offense, even though it might be of a lesser grade than that upon which he was surrendered. Furthermore, the offense for which Rauscher was actually tried, was not one which Great Britain had bound itself by the terms of the treaty with this country to surrender him. It may very well be that had he been charged in the application for extradition with only the offense for which he was tried, that the government within whose jurisdiction he was found would have refused to surrender him to the authorities of the United States. It would, therefore, seem to be clear that his trial for another offense was in violation of the faith and honor of the government, as well as of an express law of Congress."

People ex rel. Post vs. Cross, 135 N. Y., 540, 541, Oct. 18, '92.

And in re. Cooper, 143 U. S., 501, 502, Chief Justice Fuller, said:

"In U. S. vs. Rauscher, it appeared that the United States asserted the right under the law of nations to try persons extradited from Great Britain for offenses other than those for which they were extradited, while Great Britain insisted that no such right existed under the law of nations or was conceded by treaty. The question was, whether under the treaty with Great Britain, a man extradited from England to this country on the charge of murder could be tried here for another offense, and it was held that he could not be. And Mr. Justice Miller, delivering the opinion of the Court quoted from the Head Money Cases, 112 U. S., 580, 598, the following language as determinative of the principle upon which the Court proceeded: 'A treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations. It depends for the enforcement of its provisions on the interest and the honor of the governments which are parties to it. If these fail, its infraction becomes the subject of international negotiations and reclamations, so far as the injured party chooses to seek redress, which may in the end be enforced by actual war. It is obvious that with all this, the Judicial Courts have nothing to do and can give no redress. But a treaty may also contain provisions which confer certain rights upon the citizens or subjects of one of the nations residing in the territorial limits of the other, which partake of the nature of municipal law, and which are capable of enforcement as between private parties in the courts of the country. An illustration of this character is found in treaties which regulate the mutual rights of citizens and subjects of the contracting nations in regard to rights of property by descent or inheritance, when the individuals concerned are aliens. The constitution of the United States places such provisions as these in the same category as other laws of Congress, by its declaration, that, 'this constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.' A treaty, then, is a law of the land, as an act of Congress is, whenever its provisions prescribe a rule by which the rights of the private citizen or subject may be determined. And when such rights are of a nature to be enforced in a court of justice, that court resorts to the treaty for a rule of decision for the case before it as it would to a statute.' "

Mr. Justice Jackson, in distinguishing between interstate rendition, which rests entirely upon constitutional provision, and international extradition which is based upon the stipulations of treaty made pursuant to the constitution, said: "The extradition depends upon treaty contract or stipulation, which rests upon good faith, and in respect to which the sovereign upon whom the demand is made can exercise discretion, as well as investigate the charge on which the surrender is demanded."

Lascelles vs. Georgia, 148 U. S., 545.

"Lascelles claimed immunity from prosecution upon charges other than the one for which extradited, because of the protective provisions (as he viewed them) of the Federal Constitution and statutes. The court simply held against his theory of constitutional and statutory interpretation, and denied his claim of constitutional right. The subject of limitations upon the right of prosecution growing out of the principles of interstate comity, and of good faith and honest dealing with the defendant, was not adverted to, because not involved in the case. Whether, since the decision of Lascelles vs. State, a claim of immunity from additional prosecution can still be rested upon constitutional grounds, certain it is that the general grounds of justice are still open."

Ex-parte McNight, 48 Ohio St., 588.

In the Coy case, application for habeas corpus, on the ground of illegal detention, relator stated that he was extradited from the republic of Mexico on the charge of the murder of S. L. Elder and Bud Elder, and on no other charge; that in those cases he had been admitted to bail, but that he was now held in confinement by the sheriff of Bexar county, Texas, on the charge of the murder of one James Jackson; and that by the provisions of the extradition treaty, he is protected from arrest on any other charge than the one upon which he was extradited. Held, that relator has the right to claim exemption from trial upon any other charge than the charge mentioned in the extradition proceedings.

Regarding the proposition that the relator had waived his immunity from punishment for other offenses not embraced in the extradition proceedings, the court said: "Mr. Coy, while entitled to all the benefits of the law in his favor, is not a very important factor in considering this question. This government has entered into solemn treaty stipulations with Mexico with reference to refugees from justice These stipulations are, by a declaration of the constitution of the United States, the supreme law of the land, state constitutions and laws to the contrary notwithstanding. These stipulations this government cannot forget, nor can it justify their violation without justly incurring the contempt of the civilized world; and yet we are seriously told Mr. Coy has waived this binding obligation on the part of the United States, and has cancelled the right of Mexico to expect the government of the United States to keep its plighted faith. This is not all; the political authorities of the United States have made the declaration to the world contained in section 5275, Rev. St., which reads as follows: [The section here given in full.]

"And again we are gravely told Mr. Coy has released the government from this solemn declaration by a waiver. Was Mr. Coy a part of the treaty stipulations with Mexico? Is Mr Coy able to bind and unbind the government from its duties and obligations toward other nations by any act that he can perform? The statement of the proposition discloses its absurdity."

Ex-parte Coy, 32 Fed. Rep.,911, 917,(Nov. 30th, 1887.)

"He cannot be held to have forfeited any right before conviction."

Comption, Ault & Co., vs. Wilder, 40 Ohio St., 133.

The immunity of the extradited person arises from his extradition. The right is international rather than personal. It rests upon contract between two governments. His immunity is within the control of the surrendering government for the preservation of the trust reposed within that government, and for the protection of the accused. The government of the country of his asylum surrenders him to be tried for the extradition crime and no other, "until a reasonable time and opportunity have been given him, after his release or trial upon such charge, to return to the country from whose asylum he had been forcibly taken under those proceedings."

(Rauscher Case, Supra, p. 430.)

"Time and opportunity" here used, are words of limitation and forbid his arrest or trial, and render it impossible for him, by any act or omission of his own, to bind the surrendering government or release the immunity from any other offense occurring prior to his extradition, until such "time and opportunity" shall have fully expired "after his release or trial upon such charge"

The facts in the Miller extradition case are substantially these: In the early part of 1881, it is said, three men broke into a farm house not far from Pittsburg, Penn., attacked the inmates and committed a robery. A large amount of booty was carried off, and one of the burglars, Miller by name, described as a notorious and skillful criminal, was captured. He was tried, convicted and sentenced to the Western Penitentiary for eight years. After serving nearly two years he escaped, but was traced to Toronto, and steps were taken to secure his extradition.

Eminent counsel were retained, and they argued a motion before the Canadian courts that Miller should be surrendered to serve out his unexpired term. To this it was replied that the crime of burglary was not covered by the extradition treaty of 1842, between the United States and Great Britain. To meet this difficulty recourse was had to the assault committed by Miller in the course of the burglary. Assault with intent to commit murder was then and is now a crime for which, under the treaty, the surrender of a criminal may be demanded. Miller had never been indicted for this assault, and the charge was merely made for the purpose of getting him back to serve out his term of imprisonment. The Canadian authorities finally surrendered him. He was taken back to the penitentiary and there imprisoned. No proceedings were taken to punish him for the crime for which he was extradited, and after some months the matter was brought up in the Canadian Parliament, and the United States charged with a violation of good faith in the matter, on the ground that Miller was not punished for the offense for which he was surrendered, but was undergoing punishment for an offense for which he was not extradited.

The questions raised in the correspondence with regard to Winslow are these: Can a fugitive from justice, expressly surrendered on a charge of one crime, be tried for another and totaly different crime? If not, how is such a violation of the treaty to be prevented? Can the courts before which the fugitive is brought release him? And if not, how can there be any redress? Besides this, another question arose as to the effect of what is known as the English Extradition Act of 1870, which provides that a fugitive shall not be surrendered at all by England unless it appears that the country to which he is surrendered has provided by law, or by arrangement, that he shall be tried only for the offense for which he is surrendered.

Great Britain demanded a pledge from the United States that Winslow should be tried upon the charge upon which Great Britain would surrender him and no other charge.

The United States replied that the treaty provisions could not be enlarged by municipal legislation and that the treaty itself together with the way this government had construed it and acted upon it in all the years since the treaty came into existence, was a sufficient pledge. Winslow was not surrendered. See "Extradition," 136 N. A. Rev., 498, 499, (May, 1883), by A. E. Sedgwick, as to the Winslow and Miller cases. 25 Cent. L. J., 267, Sept. 23rd, '87.

The surrendering nation has the right to demand that the treaty stipulations shall control and protect the immunities of the party surrendered. "When this right is finally abandoned, the end of all extradition treaties can be confidently predicted. The United States, above all other nations, perhaps, certainly above all but England, is interested to maintain the right of asylum inviolate." Judge Lowell, on the Winslow case, 10 Am. Law Rev., 625, (July, 1876).

Hon. William Beach Lawrence, in his letter of March 28, 1879, (19 Albany Law Journal, 330), speaking of the work and report of the Royal Commission on Extradition, created in 1877, to consider the laws and treaties relative to extradition, says, the commission declare, "'the real political remedy seems to be that the accused should have a right to demand an inquiry, on which inquiry there should be no restriction on the kind of evidence to be received, except that imposed by common sense, and if the result of the inquiry should be that in the opinion of the government a proper case has been made out, discretion should be given the government in favor of the accused, either to refuse to deliver him up at all, or to require before delivering him up a specific engagement from the foreign government that, if acquitted of the crime for which he is demanded, or when he has suffered the punishment of that crime, he shall be at liberty to quit the country to which he has been surrendered. Such an engagement would probably seldom be refused. It may safely be assumed that no foreign government would be so lost to a sense of its own honor and interest as to violate a pledge so given. If it were, the order in council enabling a surrender to that foreign government should at once be revoked.'"

As indicative of the sentiment leading to the extradition treaty of 1889, reference is here made to the "Weldon bill," which passed the Canadian Parliament and was assented to May 2, 1889, but which was not to become operative until proclaimed by the Governor General. This act in its schedule contains "larceny" as an extraditable offense, but does not include the offense found in the capias of the District Court in the case at bar. The fifth section of the act is as follows: "This act shall not authorize the issue of a warrant for the extradition of any person under the provisions of this statute, to any state or country in which by the law in force in such state or country, such person may be tried after such extradition for any other offense than that for which he has been extradited, unless an assurance shall first have been given by the executive authority of such state or country, that the person whose extradition has been claimed, shall not be tried for any other offense than that on account of which such extradition has been claimed."

23 Am. Law Rev., 811.

The leading complaints made against the treaty of 1842 were, that it contained too few offenses for which extradition could be had; that it did not in express terms require that the offense for which the surrender should be made be expressed in the surrendering warrant, and that the accused should be tried on the charge of that offense and no other, until he shall have had an opportunity of returning to the country of his asylum, and that the treaty did not expressly prohibit extradition for political offenses.

Section two of the tenth article of the supplemental treaty of 1889 expressly forbids the surrender, trial or punishment of any person for any political crime or offense. In part it says. "No person surrendered by either of the high contracting parties to the other shall be triable or tried, or be punished for any political crime or offense, or for any act connected therewith, committed previously to his extradition." (26 U. S. Stat. at L., 1509). Yet in the face of this very clear prohibition, if the contention of the appellee and the decision of the District Court were the proper construction of this treaty, the accused being on bail a short time in the extradition case, takes him beyond the pale of the treaty immunity, and renders him triable and punishable on the charge of any other offense occurring prior to his extradition. The civilized nations of the earth carefully guard against surrender of persons accused of political offenses. Such immunity is now embodied in the British treaty as it is in the Mexican treaty. But when the accused is once within the country to which he has been surrendered on an extraditable charge, his immunity from trial and punishment for political offenses rests upon the treaty and nothing else. As was said with a tinge of irony in Blandford v. State, supra, a case arising under the Mexican treaty, "make a prima facie case of murder, extradite, and then try him for rebellion?" and in Com. v. Hawes, supra, p. 705, make a prima facie case of forgery, extradite, and then compel the accused to go to trial on the indictment for offenses not extraditable. And we may say of the case at bar, make a prima facie case of larceny against Cosgrove, extradite him to the State Court, and then refuse to place him on trial but hold him on bail for appearance and trial on that charge; and while that case is pending, on complaint of the same person (the appellee), arrest and hold him on a capias charging him with a non-extraditable offense and place him on trial on the indictment in the Federal Court on charges of offenses other than the extradition offense, and which are alleged to have occurred prior to his extradition.

In ex parte Coy, supra, the Court ridiculed the contention of the State that the accused, surrendered to this government under the treaty with Mexico, while entitled to all the immunities afforded him by that treaty, had it within his power to release this government from any of its solemn treaty obligations toward the surrendering nation. And Compton v. Wilder, supra, is authority that he cannot be held to have forfeited any right before conviction.

The correspondence in the Winslow case shows the uneasiness of Great Britain in 1876, regarding the treatment which our government would accord the accused, surrendered under the treaty of 1842. And the Miller case, six years later, afforded that government an opportunity to charge our own government with bad faith and an evasion of that treaty, on authority of courts and law writers of our own country.

We have, as the result of all this anxiety and agitation, the present treaty. Cosgrove was extradited under this treaty. It expressly states that he shall not be tried on any other charge than that upon which he was surrendered under the extradition proceedings. The Rauscher decision in 1886, based upon the treaty of 1842, and the acts of congress passed to carry that and other similar treaties into effect, and the treaty as supplemented in 1889, affirming the majority opinion and meeting the requirement of the dissenting opinion in that case, have firmly established the rule that the party extradited to this country from Great Britain under this treaty, can be tried for but one of the offenses named in the treaty, and that is the one named in the warrant upon which he was surrendered to this government, and cannot be arrested, triable or tried for any offense committed prior to his extradition other than that upon which he was surrendered, until he shall have had an opportunity of returning to the country from which he was surrendered.

Assignments one and two involve a discussion of bail. The District Court held that appellant being on bail for appearance in the State Court in the extradition cause, was such a free agent as to deprive him of treaty protection against the arrest on the capias in the District Court.

It is not material in this appeal whether Cosgrove went back to Canada or not during the time he was on bail pending his trial in the State Court, from June to December. If he was liable to arrest at all on the capias in that time, he would be liable if he had remained at large on bail in Michigan continuously during that entire period. The treaty gave him immunity from arrest, "until he shall have had an opportunity of returning to the country from which he was surrendered." If the time for such opportunity began to run at once upon his enlargement on bail in June, sufficient time had elapsed by December 14th, the date of his arrest on the capias. (Rec., p. 5). It appears from appellant's petition that he was urging his trial in the Recorder's Court, and that he had often requested that court to place him on trial on the larceny charge. (Rec., p. 2). He was within the state in the custody of his sureties awaiting and urging his trial in the State Court, to which he had been extradited, when arrested on the capias from the District Court. The marshal's return to the writ of habeas corpus admits that defendant was on bail for appearance in the Recorder's Court on the charge of larceny. (Rec., p. 6.) He was orderly and could at any time surrender himself for trial in the Recorder's Court, or his sureties could surrender him, at any time prior to his arrest on the capias. If appellee's contention is right and the decision of the District Court on this point in the controversy is the law governing the case, an extradited person admitted to bail thereby loses his treaty protection against arrest on charges other than the charge upon which he was surrendered on the extradition warrant and occurring prior to his extradition.

But offenses of the class for which Cosgrove was extradited to the State Court are bailable. He was entitled to bail on the authority of both the Federal and the State constitutions. Each constitution says, "Excessive bail shall not be required," U. S. Const., 8th amendment;

Const. of Mich., Art. 6, Sec. 31. "All persons shall, before conviction, be bailable by sufficient sureties, except for murder and treason, when the proof is evident, or the presumption great." Const. of Mich., Art. 6, Sec. 29. The constitutional privileges were open to Cosgrove, surrendered to the State Court on the charge of larceny. He furnished the necessary bail. His sureties were not complaining in their exercise of custody over him when he was arrested on the District Court capias, December 14, 1896. (See Opinion, Rec., p. 9). It was not necessary that he remain within the four walls of the prison. On bail he was equally in custody. He was in the custody of his sureties, who may be considered as holding him by a rope upon which they could pull at any time and bring him into the Recorder's Court for trial, if he should not voluntarily appear for trial on the extradition charge. His sureties could pick him up at will at any time and in any place and cause him to be incarcerated to insure his appearance for trial on the charge of larceny, in that court. If he was in Canada it was at the risk of his sureties, a matter which in no wise affects the district court, and which can in no wise enure to its advantage in its attempt to try appellant before he has been tried on or released from the charge upon which he was extradited and surrendered to the state court. And whether in jail, or, under his constitutional right, in the custody of jailors of his own choosing, (his sureties,) he was constantly in custody awaiting that trial, and could not be and was not at any time after he was surrendered on the extradition warrant, his own free agent. The law considers the principal as a prisoner, whose jail liberties are enlarged or circumscribed at the will of his bail.

Parker vs. Bidwell, 3 Conn., 85, 86.

In Nicolls vs. Ingersoll, 7 Johns. (N. Y.), 154, 155, Thompson, J., said: "A recurrence to a few cases in the books, showing the relation in which the law considers the bail as standing towards his principal, will render it obvious that the power with which he is clothed is not one restricted in its exercise to any particular place. Sir William Blackstone (3 Com., 290) says: The security given for the appearance of a party arrested, is called bail, because the defendant is delivered to the surety, and is supposed to continue in his friendly custody, instead of going to jail. Bail, in the language of the books, are said (6 Mod., 231) to have their principal always upon a string, which they may pull whenever they please, and surrender him in their own discharge. They may take him up, even upon a Sunday, and confine him until the next day, and then surrender him. The doing so on Sunday is no service of process, but rather like the case where the sheriff arrests a party who escapes, for that is only a continuance of the former imprisonment.

"Lord Hardwick says: (1 Atk., 237, Ex parte Gibbons.)

It is the constant language of courts that bail are their principals' jailors, and that it is upon this notion that they have an authority to take them; and that, as the principal is at liberty only by the permission and indulgence of the bail, they may take him up at any time. The same principle is recognized in Shower (Anonymous case, 214) where it is said by the court, that bail are but jailors, pro tempore; and in case a man absconds, and his bail cannot find him, they shall have a warrant to take him out of any pretended place of privilege, in order to surrender him, because he is a prisoner to the court, and they may call him at pleasure. If the principal is to be considered as standing in the situation of a prisoner who has escaped from the arrest of the sheriff, according to the language of one of the cases, can there be any reasonable doubt but a sheriff, in such case, would have a right to pursue and arrest his prisoner in a neighboring state; and, by parity of reasoning, bail must have the like authority. The cases I have referred to are sufficient to show that the law considers the principal as a prisoner, whose jail liberties are enlarged or circumscribed at the will of his bail; and, according to this view of the subject, it would seem necessarily to follow, that, as between the bail and his principal, the controlling power of the former over the latter may be exercised at all times and in all places; and this appears to me indispensable for the safety and security of bail."

It was said by this court per Mr. Justice Swayne: "When bail is given, the principal is regarded as delivered to the custody of his sureties. Their dominion is a continuance of the original imprisonment. Whenever they choose to do so, they may seize him and deliver him up in their discharge; and if that cannot be done at once, they may imprison him until it can be done. They may exercise their rights in person or by agent. They may pursue him into another State; may arrest him on the Sabbath; and, if necessary, may break and enter his house for that purpose. The seizure is not made by virtue of new process. None is needed. It is likened to the rearrest by the sheriff of an escaping prisoner. In 6 Modern it is said: 'The bail have their principal on a string, and may pull the string whenever they please, and render him in their discharge.' The rights of the bail in civil and criminal cases are the same. They may, doubtless, permit him to go beyond the limits of the State within which he is to answer, but it is unwise and imprudent to do so; and if any evil ensue, they must bear the burden of the consequences, and cannot cast them upon the obligee.

"In the case of Devine vs. The State, the court, speaking of the principal, say, 'The sureties had the control of his person; they were bound at their peril to keep him within their jurisdiction, and to have his person ready to surrender when demanded.'"

Taylor vs. Taintor, 16 Wallace, 371, 372.

Though beyond the State, the principal "was still, through his bail, in the hands of the law of that State, and held to answer there for the offense with which he was charged." Id., 373.

In an early case, Hosmer, Ch. J., said: "On principles of common law, the bail may take his principal when and where he pleases; and this is considered not as a new arrest, but as a continuance of the former imprisonment. 'He has the principal always on a string, and though extended to the remotest corner of the earth, he may pull it when he pleases.' In legal contemplation, the principal is in the custody of the bail, who is viewed as his jailor pro tempore, and the latter may always take the former, and actually confine him."

Ruggles vs. Corey, 8 Conn., 421, citing cases.

Judge Campbell said:

"It was claimed on the argument that when arrested for bastardy, Cannon was not under legal restraint, but at large, and therefore, that he was no longer under the operation of the extradition proceedings. This position is not true. He was bound to appear before the justice on the 27th of December, and would forfeit his bail if he did not. His bail were in law entitled to his custody, and could at any time have handed him over to the authorities. The legal duress in such a case is not ended until the prisoner is discharged."

Frank Cannon's Case, 47 Mich., 484.

And this court, per Mr. Justice Field, said:

"By the recognizance the principal is, in the theory of the law, committed to the custody of the sureties as to jailors of his own choosing, not that he is, in point of fact, in this country at least, subjected, or can be subjected by them to constant imprisonment; but he is so far placed in their power that they may at any time arrest him upon the recognizance and surrender him to the court, and, to the extent necessary to accomplish this, may restrain him of his liberty."

Reese vs. U. S., 9 Wall., 21.

Attention is again called to page 424 of the Rauscher case, where the court say: "That right, as we understand it, is, that he shall be tried only for the offense with which he is charged in the extradition proceedings, and for which he was delivered up, and that if not tried for that, or after trial and acquittal, he shall have a reasonable time to leave the country before he is arrested upon the charge of any other crime committed previous to his extradition." This, as we understand it, means a release and departure, or reasonable opportunity for departure after the termination of the extradition case.

The dissenting opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in the Rauscher case, supra, page 434, says: "I concede that the treaty is as much a part of the law of the United States as is a statute; and if there is anything in which it forbids a trial for any other offense than that for which the extradition was made, the accused may use it as a defense to a prosecution on any other charge until a reasonable time has elapsed after his release from custody on account of the crime for which he was sent back." A release from custody cannot mean a release on bail.

Mr. Justice Miller, in the Rauscher case, supra, pages 426, 427, in distinguishing the case of Adriance vs. LaGrave, 59 N. Y., 110, stated that, "LaGrave was held for trial in this country under extradition proceedings, by which he was removed from France under the treaty of 1843 with that nation, being out on bail, he was arrested under a writ in a civil suit for debt, which issusd from one of the courts of the State of New York. He made application by a writ of habeas corpus to be released from this arrest, on the ground that he was protected from it by the terms of the treaty under which he was surrendered, which, in that respect, was similar to those of the treaty of 1842, with Great Britian."

And the Federal Supreme Court there say that while it is not necesssary to decide whether he could be so served with process in civil proceedings, it does not follow that he would be equally liable to arrest, trial and conviction for a crime not enumerated in the extraditon treaty, and committed before his removal. And it is also there stated that the Supreme Court of New York unanimously and by three eminent judges, ordered LaGrave's discharge from the arrest under the civil writ, while the Court of Appeals reversed that order by a divided court. But nowhere in the consideration of the case did the Federal Supreme Courts make any reference to the fact that LaGrave was on bail when arrested on the writ in the civil case as rendering his condition or liability to that arrest any different from what it would have been were he in jail at the time it was served.

And further on in the Rauscher case, supra, at page 423, Mr. Justice Gray concurring in the majority opinion, says: that he concurs on the single ground that, by Revised Statutes, Section 5275, "providing measures by which any person delivered up by a foreign government for the purpose of being tried here for a crime of which he has been accused, may be secured against lawless violence 'until the final conclusion of his trial for the crimes or offenses specified in the warrant of extradition, and until his final discharge from custody or imprisonment for or on account of such crimes or offenses, and for a reasonable time thereafter,' the political deparment of government has clearly manifiested its will, in the form of an express law, (of which any person prosecuted in any court within the United States has the right to claim the protection,) and the accused shall be tried only for the crime specified in the warrant of extradition, and shall be allowed a reasonable time to depart out of the United States before he can be arrested or detained for another offense." This immunity from arrest continues during the entire period of the pendency of the extradition cause and for a reasonable time after the final termination of that cause.

And Mr. Justice Miller, who wrote the opinion of the court in the Rauscher case, in his work on the United States Constitution, page 323, says of that case, the Supreme Court held that, "the treaty would, in the event that he was either acquitted or not tried for the offense for which he had been extradited, give him a right to be set at liberty and allow him a reasonable time to return to Great Britain." Here the learned jurist and writer uses the language "acquitted or not tried," as the time and event giving the extradited person the right to be set at liberty and allowing him a reasonable time thereafter to return to Great Britain.

In ex parte Coy, supra, the accused was on bail and had long been on bail on the charge upon which he was extradited, when arrested upon the charge of another offense not embraced in the extradition proceedings; and the court refused the contention of the state that the accused had waived his treaty immunity from such arrest and punishment, and held that the treaty protected the accused from such arrest and punishment during the life of the extradition case.

"The language of the section [5275] includes not merely 'security against lawless violence' but, in addition thereto, 'the safekeeping and protection' of the accused until his acquittal, or if convicted. until he has served out his sentence, and for a reasonable time thereafter. Reasonable time for what? 'Obviously,' says the Supreme Court, 'until he shall have had a reasonable time to return unmolested to the country from which he was brought.' Mr. Justice Gray concurred in the judgment of the court solely upon that construction of the statute." In re Reinitz, 39 Fed. Rep., 207, (June 24, 1889). This is the rule adopted by a Federal Circuit Court since the decision in the case of Rauscher.

On page 208 of the Reinitz case, the court said: "If the opportunity to return is a 'right conferred' upon the prisoner as well as a duty owed to the extraditing government, it is manifest that both the right and the duty are infringed by a civil arrest as much as by a criminal one. The good faith of third persons who prosecute the prisoner becomes immaterial. See Lowell, J., on Winslow Case, 10 Am. Law Rev., 620."

"Finally, the language used by the various publicists and text writers, referred to with approval by the Supreme Court in the Rauscher case, forbids an arrest in one form of proceeding as much as in the other. Mr. William Beach Lawrence says that the prisoner is entitled, unless found guilty of the offense for which he is extradited, to be restored in safety to the country of his asylum at the time of his extradition. Judge Cooley declares that 'the prisoner has a right to have the particular offense disposed of, and then to depart in peace.' And Mr. Spear considers it 'the duty of courts to secure to him, as against all attempts at legal interference therewith, a reasonable opportunity to exercise this right.' Spear Extr., (2d ed.) 131-145, 557." In re Reinitz, 39 Fed. Rep., 208, 209.

In the case at bar, the Circuit Court of Appeals, "after the case had been fully argued on its merits," informed the District Court "that there was grave reason to doubt the correctness of [its] conclusion in the case."

C. C. A., letter, supra.

From a review of the authorities, it seems clear that the immunity from arrest given Cosgrove on his surrender to the State Court by the Canadian government extends for a reasonable length of time after the final disposition of that case. This seems the rational construction of the treaty and laws governing his surrender. We may well say of this treaty as was said by the Michigan Supreme Court in the oleomargarine cases just decided, "It will be an unfortunate day for constitutional rights, when courts begin the insidious process of undermining constitutions by holding unambiguous provisions and limitations to be directory merely, to be disregarded at pleasure." (People vs. Dettenthaler, 5 Detroit Legal News, 677, Dec. 6, 1898.)

It would seem to follow that the 5th and 6th assignments of error are well taken. The treaty of 1889, the acts of Congress pertaining to that and other similar treaties, the Federal Supreme Court decisions relating thereto, notably in the Rauscher case, the laws of the surrendering country, the requisition and the surrendering warrant, mean that Cosgrove, extradited to this country from Canada under that treaty, is entitled to protection against molestation and exempt from arrest and trial on any and every charge of offense occurring prior to his extradition until the final termination of the charge upon which he was surrendered, and for a reasonable time thereafter. It matters not how he employs the period intervening that trial. He would constantly be in legal custody and would not be subject to such arrest.

It seems to us that the learned District Judge touched upon the real motive that prompted the prosecution in this case. The marshal set the State Court machinery in motion to bring the defendant within the U. S. District Court jurisdiction on the charge of larceny. The penalty for this offense does not exceed 5 years' imprisonment or $500 fine. Howell's Annotated Statutes, (Mich.,) Sec. 9140,—"Every person who shall commit the offense of larceny * * * if the property stolen exceed the value of twenty-five dollars, shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison not more than five years, or by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars."

Immediately thereafter, the marshal and other United States authorities had Cosgrove indicted on the charges of resisting an officer in the service of a writ of attachment, and of unlawfully removing a vessel from the possession of the marshal, where the penalty is as high as ten years imprisonment and $10,000 fine. (U. S. Rev. Stat., Secs.

5383, 5398.) And then before he could be tried in the State Court on the extradition charge of larceny, he was arrested and held for a non-extraditable offense on the capias issued on the indictment, and constantly held thereon in the District Court, rendering it impossible for the Recorder's Court to produce him and try him on the charge on which he had been arraigned and held for trial in that court.

If the respondent's contention were the true construction of the meaning of the treaty, just admit the accused to bail to appear for and stand trial on the charge for which he was extradited, and after a few days, he would be subject to arrest, and would be triable for as many offenses (including political offenses) other than the extradition offense charged to have occurred prior to his extradition, as can be sought out against him, and all before his trial on the charge upon which he was surrendered. And likewise under appellee's contention admit appellant to bail, have him return to Canada, the country of his asylum, awaiting his trial in the extradition cause, and at once upon his reappearance in this country for that trial, he may be arrested and tried for as many offenses other than the extradition offense occuring prior to his extradition, as suits the will of the prosecuting authorities and regardless of the fact that the extradition cause is undisposed of and still pending. Such a construction of the treaty and laws governing Cosgrove's surrender, leads to the conclusion that his only safety and treaty protection lay in his constantly remaining in jail from the time of his surrender to the state authorities to his trial in the Recorder's Court, thus depriving him of his constitutional right of bail.

But the treaty makes no such distinction. It is a forced and unwarranted construction of the treaty and the laws governing Cosgrove's surrender. That a person constantly held in custody to respond for trial at a few hours notice, and obliged to appear and respond to keep faith with his obligation, whether within the United States or elsewhere, is so released, or such a free agent as to take him beyond the treaty protection and subject him to arrest and trial on charges other than the one upon which he was extradited and for offenses alleged to have occurred prior to his extradition, and such arrests while the extradition case is pending against him, and in the face of his constant efforts to have the extradition case disposed of, is a construction of the object and purpose and meaning of the treaty unwarranted in law, and which is unworthy of this government, and unfair and unjust to both the petitioner and the Canadian government. The treaty recognizes no difference between the custody of bail and the custody of the prison walls. His immunity from arrest on charges other than the extradition charge, occurring prior to his extradition, extends to the final determination of the case upon the extradition charge. And this is true in Cosgrove's case.

Accordingly, we contend that the District Court erred in denying the prayer of appellant's petition for habeas corpus that he be relieved from the detention and imprisonment of the District Court, and in remanding him to the custody of the marshal and holding him for trial in that court. And it is here asked that this judgment of the District Court be reversed, and a judgment entered relieving appellant from said detention and imprisonment.

REPLY BRIEF FOR APPELLANT.

Our attention is first directed to the definition the learned Solicitor General gives to the word "voluntarily" used in the marshal's return to the writ of habeas corpus.

On page 4 of his brief, he says: "If he [Cosgrove] came into the United States on any matter in anywise connected with his extradition, it could not be said that he came voluntarily. Coming into the United States at the call of the sureties on his bail bond, or to prepare for his trial, or to attend his trial, would be a coming under compulsion." Webster's dictionary, generally considered good authority on definition of words and terms, does not support him. This author shows the adjective "voluntary" to be a relative term, and gives it a meaning in law as, "According to the will, consent, or agreement of a party." "Voluntarily," is an adverb, and signifies in a voluntary manner. Having agreed with his sureties, whether specially requested by them or not, for the purpose of continuing within the state, or to attend his trial, and returning for that purpose, is a voluntary act, and bears with it the purpose of the necessary preparation for his trial.

It is presumed that every man is law-abiding and performs his social duties. (Greenleaf on Ev., Sec. 40.) The presumption gathered from the the record in this case is that if Cosgrove went to Canada, he had the assent of the sureties on his bail bond, and returned keeping faith with his obligation to his sureties. This presumption is strengthened by the fact that the sureties were not complaining in their exercise of custody over Cosgrove at any time. It is a fact of general knowledge that sureties will not put up $1000 before an earnest and vigorous effort to surrender in their discharge the principal in the bail bond. Neither does it follow that if Cosgrove returned to the United States on any matter connected with his extradition, he came involuntarily. He was here within his bail limits. Further over in brief for appellee (p. 17,) counsel argues that the sureties had no control over Cosgrove in Canada. It would be difficult to harmonize these two positions. For it is clear that the sureties had no control over Cosgrove, except in the extradition case, and if he did return from Canada in any matter connected with his extradition, such return must have been voluntary.

In a somewhat lengthy argument in the brief of opposing counsel (pages 8-13) the right to resort to stratagem is treated. None of the cases there cited arose under an extradition treaty. Stratagem is not extradition. Kidnapping is not extradition. These are methods foreign to extradition treaties. If the law upheld a government directly and itself to take by fraud from a foreign government a person who has there his asylum, it would be a risky game. Treaties furnish a legal and safe procedure. Extradition treaties do not allow the surrender of a person on one charge for the purpose of placing him on trial upon another charge, whether differing in kind or severity of penalty. It is not claimed by the appellee that stratagem was resorted to take Cosgrove on the capias. The Marshal, in his return to the writ of habeas corpus, says he found Cosgrove in Michigan, and there arrested him. And the only business that the Marshal, his counsel, the district court, or anybody else reveals that Cosgrove was attending to or had to look after in Michigan, was the bringing on and trial of his case in the recorder's court of Detroit, to which he had been extradited, and was then at large on bail within the state and district.

At the bottom of page 15 and extending on page 16 of his brief, counsel for appellee says: "I am quite willing to concede that if Cosgrove had remained in the State of Michigan, within the United States, under the jurisdiction of this government, and within reach of his bail, he would be exempt as he claims." This is a concession that a person on bail is in custody. It is a concession that a release on bail is not the release within the meaning of the treaty provision. It is a concession that the opportunity afforded the extradited person enlarged on bail to return to the country of his asylum, is not the opportunity contemplated in the treaty. Cosgrove when arrested on the capias issued in this case, was within the State of Michigan, within the United States, and was on bail in the extradition case pending in the state court. He was within the jurisdiction and custody of his sureties in the extradition case, and could surrender himself or his sureties could surrender him to the state court in that case, up to the very time of his arrest on the capias. It is the condition of affairs that existed at the very instant of Cosgrove's arrest on the capias which forms the test of the legality or the illegality of that arrest. The contention of the learned solicitor-general falls within his concession above stated.

All the cases cited and reviewed by counsel for appellee in his brief (pages 15-19) on the subject of bail, involved the question of the liability of the sureties on the bail bond. His whole argument is in that line and has no other basis. Not a case is cited where the act of the principal to the prejudice of his bail has been construed to affect the right of the principal to the protection of an extradition treaty. In Taylor vs. Taintor, 16 Wall., 372, this court said that the liberties which the sureties allowed their principal and their control over him was a matter for the sureties to bear the burden of the consequences, and could not cast them upon the obligee. And in Ex parte Coy, 32 Fed. Rep., 917, the court held that the extradited person on bail could not, by his act while so on bail, waive or cancel the right possessed by the government surrendering him under the extradition proceedings, that he should be tried in the country to which he was surrendered upon the extradition charge and no other. The treaty is a contract between two governments. Neither the person extradited under the treaty nor the surety on his bail bond for his appearance in the extradition case was a part of that treaty contract. And neither the principal nor the surety has power to release the demanding government from its obligation to the surrendering government to try the person extradited on the charge upon which he was surrendered, and no other charge of offense occurring prior to his extradition until a reasonable time after the final termination of that case.

In this connection we will answer the question asked at the very conclusion of the brief of counsel for appellee. Counsel there assumes that it is possible for a person extradited under a treaty to free himself from the extradition cause while that cause exists. If the accused in jail in Michigan, in the extradition cause, break jail and go to Canada and then return to Michigan for any purpose, being free to surrender himself or to be taken by his jailers for incarceration in the extradition cause, his act by so doing would not in the least affect the obligation of this government to the British government to try the accused on the charge upon which he was extradited, and upon no other charge occurring prior to his extradition.

The case of Cosgrove rests within the concession on page 20 of brief for appellee. Counsel there says: "I do not contend that if he had come into the United States on a matter connected with his extradition, to prepare for or attend his trial, he would be subject to arrest and prosecution for another offense." In Cosgrove's petition for habeas corpus (Rec., p. 2) he said: "Your petitioner has been held for trial in said recorder's court, but has not been tried, released or discharged by said recorder's court, and is still in the custody of said recorder's court, although your petitioner has often requested to be placed on trial before said recorder's court on said charge of larceny." This was not traversed in the return to the writ of habeas corpus.

The marshal's return states that when taken on the capias, Cosgrove was on bail in the extradition cause, and while so on bail had been back to Canada and voluntarily returned to Michigan, where the marshal found him and arrested him on the capias. This is no denial that Cosgrove was in Michigan urging his trial in the state court on the extradition charge. And in the statement of facts at the top of page three of brief for appellant, referring to the case in the recorder's court, we said: "The trial thereof urged by Cosgrove to the time of his arrest on the capias issued from the district court, and to the time of suing out the habeas corpus (Rec., p. 2.)" And again at the middle of the same page, we said: "The capias was not served until Dec. 14, 1896, and while appellant was on bail within the district awaiting his trial on the extradition charge of larceny, in the recorder's court." These allegations were in the statement of facts in the brief for appellant, and were not controverted in the statement of facts in the brief for appellee, and must be taken as conceded by appellee. Such, we think, is the proper construction of supreme court rule 21, part 3.

We submit that the judgment of the district court should be reversed and the appellant discharged from detention.

OCTOBER TERM, 1898.

THOMAS COSGROVE, APPELLANT,
v.
EUGENE D. WINNEY, UNITED STATES MARSHAL FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN. } No. 172.

BRIEF FOR THE APPELLEE.

STATEMENT.

This is an appeal from the decision of the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Michigan, remanding the appellant, Thomas Cosgrove (brought before it on a writ of habeas corpus), to the custody of Eugene D. Winney, United States marshal for that district.

Cosgrove, a resident of Sarnia, in the Dominion of Canada, was extradited from Canada on a charge of larceny pending in the police court of Detroit, Mich. Brought into that court, he gave bail for his appearance in the recorder's court of that city and was released from custody. Thereupon he returned to Canada. Subsequently he came voluntarily within the United States, at Port Huron, Mich., and was arrested on a capias issued upon an indictment pending in the United States district court for the eastern district of Michigan for the offense of obstructing a United States marshal in the execution of a writ of attachment, this alleged offense having been committed prior to his extradition on the charge pending in the State court. To secure his release, Cosgrove applied for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that having been extradited for larceny he could not be arrested and tried for obstructing an officer. The writ was granted, the marshal made his return, and the case was heard upon the petition and the return, the averments of the latter not being denied.

THE PETITION FOR THE WRIT (Record, pp. 1 to 6).

The petition, after reciting Cosgrove's arrest by the United States marshal on the indictment pending in the United States district court, says that at the time this arrest was made he was under arrest caused by a complaint filed in the police court of Detroit charging him with larceny, on which he had been extradited from Canada. Being brought before the police court of Detroit in June, 1896, he was examined and bound over for appearance and trial in the recorder's court of Detroit, at the July term, 1896. He says he has not yet been tried, released, or discharged by the recorder's court, and is still in its custody. The petition further shows that the crime for which Cosgrove was arrested by the United States marshal was committed, if at all, prior to his extradition from Canada. He submits that he can not be tried for any offense alleged to have been committed prior to his extradition until he shall have had a reasonable time and opportunity, after his release or trial upon the charge for which extradited, to return to Canada, as provided by the treaty and laws governing his surrender.

THE RETURN OF THE MARSHAL (Record, pp. 6, 7).

The marshal, after producing and describing the capias, says:

> I further return that the date of the capture of said Thomas Cosgrove, under said capias, was the 10th day of December, 1896; the place, Port Huron, in said district, and the cause as specified in said capias was the filing of an indictment by the grand jurors for said district against him on a charge of obstructing the United States marshal in the execution of a writ of attachment. The place of detention of said Thomas Cosgrove is the Wayne County jail in Detroit, in said district. That said Thomas Cosgrove, at the time of his arrest on said capias, was not in custody upon a warrant issued out of the police court of the city of Detroit, as set forth in the petition, but before that time, had entered into recognizance to appear and answer an information to be filed against him in the recorder's court of the city of Detroit for the offense charged on said warrant, and at the time said Cosgrove was taken into custody upon said capias, he was at large upon bail before then given. And I further return that after said Cosgrove was brought to the city of Detroit by virtue of the extradition proceedings, referred to in his petition for this writ, and before his arrest upon said capias, he had returned to the Dominion of Canada, and after said return and before his arrest on said capias, he voluntarily came into the United States, to the State of Michigan, and was then found at large after his said voluntary return, and was then arrested upon said capias while so voluntarily in the State of Michigan.

From this return, which was not traversed and must be taken as true, it appears that the presence of Cosgrove at Port Huron, in the State of Michigan, and within the United States, at the time of his arrest, was in no way connected with his extradition. It is not claimed that he returned to Michigan from Canada to prepare for or to attend his trial, or at the instance of his bail. The return states that "he voluntarily came into the United States, to the State of Michigan, and was then found at large after his voluntary return, and was then arrested upon said indictment while so voluntarily in the State of Michigan." If he came into the United States on any matter in anywise connected with his extradition, it could not be said that he came voluntarily. Coming into the United States at the call of the sureties on his bail bond, or to prepare for his trial, or to attend his trial, would be a coming under compulsion. But he came voluntarily, and, while so voluntarily within the United States, was arrested.

The appellant contends that, under article 3 of the extradition convention between the United States and Great Britain, promulgated March 25, 1890 (26 Stats., 1508), and section 5275, Revised Statutes, he is exempt from arrest for an offense committed prior to his extradition and other than that for which he was surrendered until a reasonable time after his trial on the charge for which he was surrendered and until he shall have had an opportunity of returning to the country from which he was surrendered.

Article 3 of the extradition convention reads:

> No person surrendered by or to either of the high contracting parties shall be triable or be tried for any crime or offense, committed prior to his extradition, other than the offense for which he was surrendered, until he shall have had an opportunity of returning to the country from which he was surrendered.

By section 5275 of the Revised Statutes it is provided:

> Whenever any person is delivered by any foreign government to an agent of the United States, for the purpose of being brought within the United States and tried for any crime of which he is duly accused, the President shall have power to take all necessary measures for the transportation and safe-keeping of such accused person, and for his security against lawless violence, until the final conclusion of his trial for the crimes or offenses specified in the warrant of extradition, and until his final discharge from custody or imprisonment for or on account of such crimes or offenses, and for a reasonable time thereafter, and may employ such portion of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as may be necessary for the safe-keeping and protection of the accused.

The Government concedes that Cosgrove could not be tried for an offense, other than that for which he was surrendered, committed prior to his extradition, without having had an opportunity to return to Canada; but it submits that Cosgrove, after he was extradited, had an opportunity to return to Canada, for he did return to Canada, and that his subsequent presence in the United States was not enforced but voluntary. This voluntary presence in the United States rendered him liable to arrest for any crime, for the exemption of the treaty applies only when the accused is brought within the United States to answer a specific offense and is kept here under compulsion of law for that purpose alone. In this case, the conceded fact outweighs the legal fiction; the voluntary return excludes the presumption of a compulsory presence.

ARGUMENT.

I.

There is practically no dispute about the law. I concede that a man can not be extradited from Canada for one offense and tried for another, committed prior to his extradition, without having had an opportunity of returning to Canada. But the controversy arises, as most do, from the application or attempted application of the law to the facts. Did Cosgrove have an opportunity of returning to Canada? Does the exemption apply under the peculiar circumstances of this case? The treaty provides that the surrendered person shall have an opportunity of returning. Why? That he may return if he desires to, and if he does not and stays, that his presence may not be compulsory, but voluntary. He is secured the right to return because, once within his own country, he is beyond the jurisdiction of the country to which he had been conveyed for trial upon a specific charge. He can not be compelled to put himself in its power again except by further extradition proceedings. Of course, if he voluntarily returns, it is at his peril. His asylum (if I may use that term) is his own land, the country from which he was extradited. The treaty protects him by insuring his return to it after answering the charge for which he was extradited. If after his return he leaves his own country, his asylum, not by constraint of law, but to serve his own ends, he puts himself within the jurisdiction and power of the country whose law he is charged with violating, and is in no position to appeal either to its courts or to his own Government, for exemption from trial and punishment.

II.

Fundamentally each nation is sovereign and supreme within its own territory. It does not have to deliver up to another alleged fugitives from justice found within its borders, and it may arrest, try, and punish any violator of its own law that it can lay its hands on.

In the case of United States v. Rauscher (119 U. S., 407), where this court held, Mr. Justice Miller delivering the opinion, that under our treaty with England a man extradited for one crime could not be tried for another growing out of the same transaction, the court was careful to base its decision upon the special provision of the treaty, saying (page 411):

> It is only in modern times that the nations of the earth have imposed upon themselves the obligation of delivering up these fugitives from justice > to the States where their crimes were committed, for trial and punishment. This has been done generally by treaties made by one independent government with another. Prior to these treaties, and apart from them, it may be stated as the general result of the writers upon international law, that there was no well-defined obligation on one country to deliver up such fugitives to another, and though such delivery was often made, it was upon the principle of comity, and within the discretion of the government whose action was invoked; and it has never been recognized as among those obligations of one government towards another which rest upon established principles of international law.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in his dissenting opinion, adverts to the fundamental rule recognized in this country in these words (page 434):

> I am unable to concur in the decision in this case. A fugitive from justice has no absolute right of asylum in a country to which he flees, and if he can be got back within the jurisdiction of the country whose laws he has violated he may be proceeded with precisely the same as if he had not fled, unless there is something in the laws of the country where he is to be tried, or in the way in which he was got back, to prevent.

III.

A fugitive from justice acquires from that fact alone no right of asylum in a foreign country, which exempts him from trial here, if he falls within the clutches of the law. Let the law once lay its hand on him, whether he is lured within its reach by fraud, or brought here by force, or thoughtlessly or unwittingly comes voluntarily within our jurisdiction, once here and once in the hands of the law, he must stand his trial and submit to the punishment the law may inflict for his crime.

In Ex Parte Brown, 28 Federal Reporter, 653 (1886), it was held that a fugitive from justice charged with crime will not be released, on habeas corpus, because he was induced by stratagem to come within territory where he could be properly arrested. Brown was indicted in Erie County, Pa., for perjury. He fled to Canada. He was induced by the false statements of parties employed by those interested in his conviction to come into the State of New York, where he was arrested. He insisted that he was not a fugitive from justice, his presence in New York having been obtained by fraud. Coxe, J., delivering the opinion, says, page 655:

> The question remains, Was the duty of the executive to deliver up the petitioner at all affected by the fact that he was induced by the trickery and fraud of private parties to come within this jurisdiction? I am entirely clear that it was not. The contention that a party charged with crime is entitled to be released on habeas corpus, because, by a stratagem,—which, though morally reprehensible, is not criminal, in a legal sense,—he is induced to come within territory where he may be properly arrested, is not supported by a single authority.

> The criminal law, administered, as it is, for the protection of the whole people, does not take cognizance of the means by which alleged offenders are apprehended, so long as no act is done which in itself is an infraction of the law.

In Ker v. Illinois (119 U. S., 436) it was held that a criminal obtains no right of asylum in the foreign country to which he flees. Ker was under indictment in Illinois for larceny. He fled to Peru. A messenger with a warrant for his extradition went to Peru, but instead of applying to the authorities of Peru for Ker's extradition, kidnaped him and brought him back to the United States. Then Ker applied for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that his right of asylum had been violated. The court held that once within the United States he was subject to arrest and prosecution here. It did not matter how he got here.

Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the court, said, page 442:

> There is no language in this treaty, or in any other treaty made by this country on the subject of extradition, of which we are aware, which says in terms that a party fleeing from the United States to escape punishment for crime becomes thereby entitled to an asylum in the country to which he has fled; indeed, the absurdity of such a proposition would at once prevent the making of a treaty of that kind. It will not be for a moment contended that the Government of Peru could not have ordered Ker out of the country on his arrival, or at any period of his residence there. If this could be done, what becomes of his right of asylum?

And on page 444:

> The question of how far his forcible seizure in another country and transfer by violence, force, or fraud to this country could be made available to resist trial in the State court, for the offense now charged upon him, is one which we do not feel called upon to decide, for in that transaction we do > not see that the Constitution, or laws, or treaties, of the United States guarantee him any protection. There are authorities of the highest respectability which hold that such forcible abduction is no sufficient reason why the party should not answer when brought within the jurisdiction of the court which has the right to try him for such an offense, and presents no valid objection to his trial in such court.

Mr. Justice Miller concludes with the comforting suggestion that Ker is not without a remedy. "He could sue Julian (the messenger) in an action of trespass and false imprisonment."

In the case of Mahon v. Justice (127 U. S., 700), a fugitive from the justice of Kentucky was kidnaped in West Virginia and forcibly carried back to Kentucky, where he was held for trial on a criminal charge. The governor of West Virginia demanded his restoration to the jurisdiction of that State, which, being refused, his release was sought by habeas corpus. The court declined to release him. After reviewing a number of cases upon the subject, Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, said, page 712:

> Other cases might be cited from the State courts holding similar views. There is indeed an entire concurrence of opinion as to the ground upon which a release of the appellant in the present case is asked, namely, that his forcible abduction from another State, and conveyance within the jurisdiction of the court holding him, is no objection to his detention and trial for the offense charged. They all proceed upon the obvious ground that the offender against the law of the State is not relieved from liability because of personal injuries received from private > parties, or because of indignities committed against another State. It would indeed be a strange conclusion, if a party charged with a criminal offense could be excused from answering to the government whose laws he had violated because other parties had done violence to him, and also committed an offense against the laws of another State.

In Lascelles v. Georgia (148 U. S., 537) this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Jackson, held that a fugitive from justice who has been surrendered by one State to another State upon a requisition charging him with a specific crime may be arrested and prosecuted for another and different crime without first having an opportunity to return to the State from which he was extradited. After stating the argument urged by counsel for Lascelles, Mr. Justice Jackson says (page 542):

> But the fallacy of the argument lies * * * in the further assumption that a fugitive from justice acquires in the State to which he may flee some State or personal right of protection, improperly called a right of asylum, which secures to him exemption from trial and punishment for a crime committed in another State, unless such crime is made the special object or ground of his rendition.

> But it is settled by the decisions of this court that, except in the case of a fugitive surrendered by a foreign Government, there is nothing in the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States which exempts an offender, brought before the courts of a State for an offense against its laws, from trial and punishment, even though brought from another State by unlawful violence, or by abuse of legal process. (Ker v. Illinois, 119 U. S., 436, 444; Mahon v. Justice, 127 U. S., 700, 707, 708, 712, 715; Cook v. Hart, 146 U. S., 183, 190, 192.)

IV.

The exemption provided by the treaty is, as I have shown, an exception to the principle of territorial sovereignty, but it is an exception which appeals to our sense of justice and fairness. There is a general rule that when the law compels a person to attend at a particular place, away from his home, for one purpose, it will protect him against an unfair advantage being taken of his presence there for another purpose. As Judge Cooley said, in an article in the Princeton Review of January, 1876, quoted in Hawley on Extradition, bottom page 11:

> To obtain the surrender of a man on one charge and then put him upon trial on another is a gross abuse of the constitutional compact. We believe it to be a violation also of legal principles. It is a general rule, that where, by compulsion of law, a man is brought within the jurisdiction for one purpose, his presence shall not be taken advantage of to subject him to legal demands or legal restraint for another purpose. The legal privileges from arrest when one is in the performance of a legal duty away from his home rest upon this rule, and they are merely the expressions of reasonable exception from unfair advantages.

So in Frank Cannon's Case (47 Mich., 481), Cannon was extradited on a charge of seduction, and while on bail under this charge was arrested on a complaint for bastardy. He was discharged by habeas corpus, Judge

Campbell delivering the opinion, on the ground that an enforced presence within the jurisdiction of the State to answer a criminal charge could not be taken advantage of by the authorities in order to subject him to a civil prosecution.

> It is the law of this State, whatever doubts may exist elsewhere, that when the law compels a person to attend at a place away from that where he is abiding, it at the same time usually protects him from having undue advantage taken of his unwilling and enforced presence. And this is no more than simple justice. Everyone in legal custody has a right to legal protection. Accordingly it was held in Watson v. Judge of the Superior Court of Detroit (40 Mich., 729) that an arrest in a State court of a person attending under process of a Federal court, was unlawful, and should not be permitted whether the Federal court interfered or not. The question was fully discussed on its general merits, and the very well considered case of Commonwealth v. Hawes (13 Bush, Ky., 697) was referred to with approval, as declaring the correct doctrine on the subject. It was claimed on the argument here that while that case may have been properly decided as applicable to extradition treaties with other nations, it had no bearing on extradition between States. We do not perceive any ground for the distinction.

I quote the language of Judge Cooley in the Princeton Review, and of Judge Campbell in Frank Cannon's Case, to emphasize the fact that the exemption is based upon and accompanies enforced presence by compulsion of law within the jurisdiction. If there be no compulsory presence there can be no exemption. Legal protection goes along with legal compulsion. When for any cause the presence of a person becomes voluntary, then the protection of the law ceases. In the case of Commonwealth v. Hawes (13 Bush (Ky.), 697), in which it was held that a man extradited from Canada for forgery could not be tried for embezzlement or for uttering forged paper, the court (Chief Justice Lindsey delivering the opinion) took pains to guard the right of the State to try Hawes for embezzlement and for uttering forged paper, in case he should come voluntarily within its jurisdiction. Page 713:

> He is not entitled to personal immunity in consequence of his flight. We may yet try him under each and all of the indictments for embezzlement and for uttering forged paper, if he comes voluntarily within the jurisdiction of our laws, or if we can reach him through the extradition clause of the Federal Constitution, or through the comity of a foreign government.

In the case before the court, Cosgrove came voluntarily within the jurisdiction of our laws, and so we can try him without regard to the offense for which he was extradited.

V.

But the appellant insists that being on bail he remained, until his bail should be discharged, in the custody of his sureties, and therefore, until tried on the charge for which extradited or released from bail, was exempt from arrest and trial on any other charge.

I am quite willing to concede that if Cosgrove had remained in the State of Michigan, within the United States, under the jurisdiction of this Government, and within reach of his bail, he would be exempt as he claims. But this is on the theory that his bail keeps him here, and that it violates the treaty and takes unfair advantage of his enforced presence to arrest and try him for a charge other than that for which he was extradited. But when he leaves this country and goes back to Canada, what becomes of the compulsion of his bail? It amounts to nothing in law. His sureties can not follow him into Canada and arrest and bring him back. He is free to come back or not, as he pleases. The only constraint is a moral one—an obligation of honor not to leave his sureties in the lurch; and a compensation in money, a quid pro quo, will satisfy that.

Opposing counsel cites a number of authorities to the effect that a principal is regarded as within the custody of his sureties. So he is, but the first duty of the sureties is to keep the principal within the jurisdiction of the court. Out of it, their custody also ends with the jurisdiction of the State. I beg to refer to a few cases upon this point.

In Reese v. United States (9 Wall., 13) it was distinctly held that the power of sureties to arrest does not extend beyond the jurisdiction of the United States. It appears that in this case the Government agreed with one Limantour, under indictment in the United States court, and who had given bail for his appearance, that his case might be postponed to an indefinite future term, to await a decision in certain civil cases pending in the United States court, on an appeal from the decision of the California land commissioners. In the event of the decision in the civil cases being adverse to Limantour, he was to stand his trial on the criminal charge; otherwise and in the event of his success in the civil suits the criminal prosecution was to be dismissed. Under this understanding and consent of the United States attorney, he went to Mexico and never returned. He was beaten in the civil suits, and failing to return his sureties on the bail bond were sued. The court held, speaking by Mr. Justice Field, that under the circumstances they were discharged.

Bottom p. 21:

> There is also another view of the stipulation which leads to the same result. By the recognizance the principal is, in the theory of the law, committed to the custody of the sureties as to jailers of his own choosing, not that he is, in point of fact, in this country at least, subjected or can be subjected by them to constant imprisonment; but he is so far placed in their power that they may at any time arrest him upon the recognizance and surrender him to the court, and, to the extent necessary to accomplish this, may restrain him of his liberty. This power of arrest can only be exercised within the territory of the United States; and there is an implied covenant on the part of the principal with his sureties, when he is admitted to bail, that he will not depart out of this territory without their assent. There is also an implied covenant on the part of the Government, when the recognizance of bail is accepted, that it will not in any way interfere with this covenant between them, or impair its obligation, or take any proceedings with the principal which will increase the risks of the sureties or affect their remedy against him. * * *

> The Government thus consented that Limantour might depart out of the territory of the United States to a foreign country, where it would be impossible for the bail to exercise their right to arrest and surrender him; and further, it consented that he might remain abroad for a period of indefinite duration. This was all done without the concurrence or even knowledge of the sureties, whose risks were thus greatly increased.

In Taylor v. Taintor (16 Wall., 366) this court held that the sureties of a party out on bail under a criminal charge were not released by his arrest in another State, whither he had gone with their consent, on another criminal charge. The sureties were bound to keep their principal within the jurisdiction of the court and to have his person ready to surrender when demanded. Their negligence or connivance, in permitting their principal to go beyond the jurisdiction of the court and within the jurisdiction of another State, could not relieve them from liability on their bond.

In United States v. Van Fossen (1 Dill., 406) Judge Dillon took the view that it was no defense to an action against the sureties on a bond in a criminal case that the principal had gone beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and into another State, and committed an offense against its laws, for which he was arrested. It was the duty of the sureties to prevent their principal going beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

In Devine v. The State (5 Sneed, 623), it was held that the sureties of a defendant admitted to bail on criminal charge have custody of his person and are bound at their peril to keep him within the jurisdiction of the court. If they become apprehensive for their own safety, they can arrest and commit him to prison at any time.

Judge McKinney says, page 625:

> In legal contemplation, upon the recognizance being entered into, the principal was delivered into the "friendly custody" of his sureties, instead of being committed to prison. (4 Bl. Com., 301.) The sureties had control of his person; they were bound at their peril, to keep him within the jurisdiction, and to have his person ready to surrender when demanded. If apprehensive for their own safety, they had the right to arrest and commit him to prison at any time, so as to have him forthcoming to answer the charge to which he had been indicted, as they had voluntarily undertaken to do. And if they negligently permitted him to go beyond their reach, it was their own folly, and they must abide the consequences.

It appears, therefore, from these cases that when Cosgrove left the United States and returned to Canada he violated the implied covenant which he had with his sureties, when admitted to bail, that he would not depart out of this country without their assent (Reese v. United States, 9 Wall., 13, 21); and if he departed from the United States with the assent of his sureties, then they violated their obligation with the State, because they were bound to keep him within the jurisdiction of the court and to have his person ready to surrender when demanded. (Taylor v. Taintor, 16 Wall., 366; United States v. Van Fossen, 1 Dall., 406; Devine v. The State, 5 Sneed, 623, 625.)

VI.

The appellant invokes the protection of section 5275 of the Revised Statutes, but the protection afforded by this section only operates while the extradited person is within the United States, brought here and kept here to answer a charge for which he was extradited. If the extradited person departs from the United States, he abandons the protection which this section offers. He seeks by choice the protection of his own country in thus returning to it. If he leaves it afterwards, except in connection with his extradition, he does so at his own risk, and if arrested within the territory of the country whose law he is charged with violating, there is nothing in the treaty or in the laws of this country to stand in the way of his trial and punishment.

In returning to Canada Cosgrove broke the covenants and obligations of his bail, because he put himself out of the reach of his sureties and beyond the jurisdiction of the court. I do not contend that if he had come into the United States on a matter connected with his extradition, to prepare for or attend his trial, he would be subject to arrest and prosecution for another offense. Presence in the United States in connection with his extradition would not be voluntary but compulsory. In this case his presence here was voluntary; he returned of his own choice and for his own private purposes. Under these circumstances he was not under the protection of the treaty or the statute, but liable to arrest and prosecution.

Suppose Cosgrove, instead of being bailed, and of returning to Canada as he did, had been imprisoned in Michigan and had broken jail and returned to Canada, but subsequently, for some private reason unconnected with his extradition, voluntarily came within the United States. Will it be claimed that the protection of the treaty and of our statute attached to him as soon as he struck our soil?

JOHN K. RICHARDS,
Solicitor-General.

JANUARY 24, 1899.

COSGROVE v. WINNEY.

APPEAL FROM THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN.

No. 172. Submitted January 19, 1899. — Decided April 24, 1899.

The appellant, a Canadian, was extradited from Canada under the extradition treaty between Great Britain and the United States, and, being brought before a police court of Detroit was charged with larceny, gave bail for his appearance at the trial, and returned to Canada. Returning from Canada to Detroit voluntarily before the time fixed for trial, he was arrested on a capias issued from the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan before his extradition, charging him with an offence for which he was not extraditable, and was taken into custody by the marshal of that district. He applied to the District Court of the United States for a writ of habeas corpus which was allowed. After hearing and argument his application for a discharge was refused by the District Court. On appeal to this court it is Held: That under the circumstances the appellant retained the right to have the offence for which he was extradited disposed of, and then to depart in peace, and that this arrest was in abuse of the high process under which he was originally brought into the United States, and cannot be sustained.

NOVEMBER 7, 1895, Winney, United States marshal for the Eastern District of Michigan, made a complaint before one of the police justices of the city of Detroit within that district against Thomas Cosgrove for the larceny of a boat, named the Aurora, her tackle, etc., whereon a warrant issued for his arrest. Cosgrove was a resident of Sarnia, in the Province of Ontario, Dominion of Canada, and extradition proceedings were had in accordance with the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, which resulted in a requisition on the Canadian Government, which was duly honored, and a surrendering warrant issued May 19, 1896, on which Cosgrove was brought to Detroit to respond to the charge aforesaid; was examined in the police court of Detroit; was bound over to the July term, 1896, of the recorder's court of that city; and was by that court held for trial, and furnished bail. He thereupon went to Canada, but came back to Detroit in December, 1896.

December 3, 1895, a capias issued out of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan, on an indictment against Cosgrove, on the charge of obstructing the United States marshal in the execution of a writ of attachment, which was not served until December 10, 1896, some months after Cosgrove had been admitted to bail in the recorder's court.

Cosgrove having been taken into custody by the marshal applied to the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus, which was issued, the marshal made return, and the cause was duly argued.

The court entered a final order denying the application and remanding the petitioner. From this order an appeal was taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals, and there dismissed, whereupon an appeal to this court was allowed, and Cosgrove discharged on his own recognizance.

The district judge stated in his opinion that it appeared "that the property, for the taking of which he [Cosgrove] is charged with larceny, was the vessel which, under the indictment in this court, he was charged with having unlawfully taken from the custody of the United States marshal, while the same was held under a writ of attachment issued from the District Court in admiralty."

And further: "The only question which arises under this treaty therefore is whether upon the facts stated in the return which was not traversed, the petitioner has had the opportunity secured him by that treaty to return to his own country. If he has had such opportunity, then article 3 has not been violated, either in its letter or spirit, by the arrest and detention of the petitioner. It is conceded that he was delivered to the authorities of the State of Michigan in May, 1896, to stand his trial upon the charge of larceny. He gave bail to appear for trial in the recorder's court when required and immediately returned to Canada. On December 10, 1896, he voluntarily appeared in the State of Michigan, of his own motion, and not upon the order of the recorder's court, or at the instance of his bail, and while in this district was arrested."

Mr. E. H. Sellers and Mr. Cassius Hollenbeck for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor General for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court.

Article three of the Extradition Convention between the United States and Great Britain, promulgated March 25, 1890, 26 Stat. 1508, and section 5275 of the Revised Statutes, are as follows:

"Article III. No person surrendered by or to either of the High Contracting Parties shall be triable or be tried for any crime or offence, committed prior to his extradition, other than the offence for which he was surrendered, until he shall have had an opportunity of returning to the country from which he was surrendered."

"SEC. 5275. Whenever any person is delivered by any foreign government to an agent of the United States, for the purpose of being brought within the United States and tried for any crime of which he is duly accused, the President shall have power to take all necessary measures for the transportation and safekeeping of such accused person, and for his security against lawless violence, until the final conclusion of his trial for the crimes or offences specified in the warrant of extradition, and until his final discharge from custody or imprisonment for or on account of such crimes or offences, and for a reasonable time thereafter, and may employ such portion of the land and naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as may be necessary for the safekeeping and protection of the accused."

Cosgrove was extradited under the treaty, and entitled to all the immunities accorded to a person so situated; and it is admitted that the offence for which he was indicted in the District Court was committed prior to his extradition, and was not extraditable. But it is insisted that although he could not be extradited for one offence and tried for another, without being afforded the opportunity to return to Canada, yet as, after he had given bail, he did so return, his subsequent presence in the United States was voluntary and not enforced, and therefore he had lost the protection of the treaty and rendered himself subject to arrest on the capias and to trial in the District Court for an offence other than that on which he was surrendered; and this although the prosecution in the state court was still pending and undetermined, and Cosgrove had not been released or discharged therefrom.

Conceding that if Cosgrove had remained in the State of Michigan and within reach of his bail, he would have been exempt, the argument is that, as he did not continuously so remain, and, during his absence in Canada, his sureties could not have followed him there and compelled his return, if his appearance happened to be required according to the exigency of the bond, which the facts stated show that it was not, it follows that when he actually did come back to Michigan he had lost his exemption.

But we cannot concur in this view. The treaty and statute secured to Cosgrove a reasonable time to return to the country from which he was surrendered, after his discharge from custody or imprisonment for or on account of the offence for which he had been extradited, and at the time of this arrest he had not been so discharged by reason of acquittal; or conviction and compliance with sentence; or the termination of the state prosecution in any way. United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 407, 433.

The mere fact that he went to Canada did not in itself put an end to the prosecution or to the custody in which he was held by his bail, or even authorize the bail to be forfeited, and when he reëntered Michigan he was as much subject to the compulsion of his sureties as if he had not been absent.

In Taylor v. Taintor, 16 Wall. 366, 371, Mr. Justice Swayne, speaking for the court, said: "When bail is given, the principal is regarded as delivered to the custody of his sureties. Their dominion is a continuance of the original imprisonment. Whenever they choose to do so, they may seize him and deliver him up in their discharge; and if that cannot be done at once, they may imprison him until it can be done. They may exercise their rights in person or by agent. They may pursue him into another State; may arrest him on the Sabbath; and, if necessary, may break and enter his house for that purpose. The seizure is not made by virtue of new process. None is needed. It is likened to the rearrest by the sheriff of an escaping prisoner. In 6 Modern, 231, it is said: 'The bail have their principal on a string, and may pull the string whenever they please, and render him in their discharge.' The rights of the bail in civil and criminal cases are the same. They may doubtless permit him to go beyond the limits of the State within which he is to answer, but it is unwise and imprudent to do so; and if any evil ensue, they must bear the burden of the consequences, and cannot cast them upon the obligee."

Opinion of the Court.

We think the conclusion cannot be maintained on this record that, because of Cosgrove's temporary absence, he had waived or lost an exemption which protected him while he was subject to the state authorities to answer for the offence for which he had been extradited.

The case is a peculiar one. The marshal initiated the prosecution in the state courts, and some weeks thereafter the indictment was found in the District Court for the same act on which the charge in the state courts was based. The offences, indeed, were different, and different penalties were attached to them. But it is immaterial that Cosgrove might have been liable to be prosecuted for both, as that is not the question here, which is whether he could be arrested on process from the District Court before the prior proceeding had terminated and he had had opportunity to return to the country from which he had been taken. Or, rather, whether the fact of his going to Canada pending the state proceedings deprived him of the immunity he possessed by reason of his extradition so that he could not claim it though the jurisdiction of the state courts had not been exhausted; he had come back to Michigan; and he had had no opportunity to return to Canada after final discharge from the state prosecution.

We are of opinion that, under the circumstances, Cosgrove retained the right to have the offence for which he was extradited disposed of and then to depart in peace, and that this arrest was in abuse of the high process under which he was originally brought into the United States, and cannot be sustained.

Final order reversed and cause remanded with a direction to discharge petitioner.
